Congressional Record.

SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 21, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have been following the path that has taught us the course of the pursuit of the ideal. But Thou art leading us on, sometimes amid the shadows and with anxious hearts, and yet with hearts aglow with fervor and passion for the truth and in anticipation of the final victory. We would rather walk in the dark with God than walk alone in the light. So do Thou give us those spiritual qualities that will ever inspire us to follow the gleam until the light of the victory which shall make free a world shall break in upon us by Thy grace. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Calder	Gulon	Nelson	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Thomas
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Trammell
Cummins	Kellogg	Pomerene	Vardaman
Curtis	Kendrick	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	Lodge	Sheppard	Wilfley
Drew	McNary	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. OWEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate, engaged in a conference.

Mr. FRANCE, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WALSH, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. KING, and Mr. FALL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to notify absent Senators that their attendance is needed in the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] is necessarily absent on official business. He telephoned he would be here shortly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. RANSDELL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF MINERAL OILS (S. DOC. NO. 280).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Director of the Bureau of Mines, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 11th instant, certain information relative to the production and consumption of crude petroleum and other mineral oils in this country, and the amount required for export and the estimated stocks on hand at the present time, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

THE BUILDING SITUATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the War Industries Board, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 13th instant, certain information relative to the construction and alteration of public or private buildings.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the report from the War Industries Board just submitted to the Senate affects the construction of buildings of every sort in the country. It is a matter of very great importance; in fact, I think it is the most far-reaching order issued by any department or board of the Government affecting the industries of the Nation since the war began. It is of such great importance that I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in the near future it is my purpose to discuss this whole subject and its effect upon the country.

The report referred to is as follows:

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD,
WASHINGTON.

To the honorable the PRESIDENT AND SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: On behalf of the War Industries Board, I beg to comply with Senate resolution 304, passed September 13, 1918, and transmitted to me the same day.

1. The only order promulgated by the War Industries Board "relative to the construction and alteration of public or private buildings" is contained in Circular No. 21, issued September 3, 1918, and supplemented under date of September 10, 1918. Copies of the order and the supplement are attached hereto.

2. Said orders were issued under the authority conferred upon the War Industries Board and its chairman by the President of the United States, in a communication to the chairman dated March 4, 1918, and confirmed by Executive order dated May 28, 1918, whereby the War Industries Board was created a separate administrative agency of the President, with the powers, duties, and functions set forth in the said communication from the President of March 4, 1918. Copies of said communication and of said Executive order are attached hereto.

I beg to call particular attention to the following powers and duties thus specifically conferred by the President upon the board and its chairman:

(a) "The studious conservation of resources and facilities by scientific, commercial, and industrial economies."

b. "The determination, wherever necessary, of priorities of production and of delivery and of the proportions of any given article to be made immediately accessible to the several purchasing agencies when the supply of that article is insufficient, either temporarily or permanently."

c. The chairman's duty to guide and assist "in obtaining access to materials in any way preempted," and "to anticipate the prospective needs of the several supply departments of the Government and their feasible adjustment to the industry of the country as far in advance as possible, in order that as definite an outlook and opportunity for planning as possible may be afforded the business men of the country."

I refer also to the act of Congress of August 10, 1917, known as the priority of shipment act.

3. In further response to Senate resolution 304, permit me to add:

In carrying out the duties, with which we were thus charged by the President, the War Industries Board and its chairman found the following situation to exist with respect to building and construction facilities and supplies:

a. Iron and steel are a necessary part of every completed building. They are necessary for plumbing, heating, ventilating, piping, hardware, and mechanical equipment. The direct and indirect war needs of this country and of our allies for the last six months of the current year already exceed 21,000,000 tons and the country's total output for the first six months was less than 17,000,000 tons. The unavoidable result is that iron and steel can not be used for nonwar or less essential purposes.

b. The United States Fuel Administration, finding that the production of building materials consumed upward of 30,000,000 tons of fuel per annum, and that there was a shortage in the fuel necessary for our war program, curtailed very materially the fuel allowed for building materials. The continued production of building materials for nonwar and less essential projects would now necessarily be at the expense of productions which our war program requires.

c. The Railroad Administration finds that 25 per cent of the total tonnage moved by the railroads is building material. It is absolutely essential that the portion of this tonnage which represents materials not needed for war or essential purposes should be displaced by tonnage which is.

d. The United States Employment Service finds that there is an acute shortage in the labor needed for the war program. It is absolutely essential that labor which now may be idle, or which may be engaged on nonwar or less essential work, should be employed upon work which will contribute toward winning the war.

It is therefore evident that the building and construction field furnishes an instance calling imperatively for the exercise by the War Industries Board of the duty with which the President charged it, of conserving the resources and facilities of the country for war purposes, of determining necessary priorities in production and in delivery, of obtaining access to materials in any way preempted, and of anticipating prospective war needs.

It is clear that there is not enough iron, steel, transportation facilities, fuel, and labor to supply the direct and indirect war needs of the country and the nonwar needs also, and that the resources and facilities used in nonwar and less essential building projects can only be applied thereto by taking them from the war needs.

The inevitable result of this would be failure to supply the war requirements of the country as they are needed. It would mean that nonwar and less essential needs would be produced at the sacrifice of war needs, with the consequent postponement of the day when the war will end and when American lives will be freed from the hazards of battle.

The attached orders were promulgated by the War Industries Board as a necessary means of avoiding this unhappy result.

These orders were only issued after the nearly six months' warning given by the resolution of March 21, 1918, which is quoted at length in Circular No. 21.

Attention is also called to the fact that before Circular No. 21 was issued numerous conferences were held between the board and the manufacturers of the principal building materials. The latter appreciated fully the situation as briefly outlined above and heartily agreed to cooperate with the board in carrying into effect the spirit of the resolution of March 21, 1918, and to that end to enter into the pledge set forth in Circular No. 21.

The manufacturers, however, felt that, not having the country's war program before them, it was impossible for them to determine what building projects were essential and what were less essential. They felt that the War Industries Board should determine this question as definitely as possible and should pass upon doubtful cases for them.

Accordingly the board did determine what were essential projects, defining them in paragraphs numbered (1) to (5), inclusive, of Circular No. 21, and projects of this character may proceed as therein explained. Other building projects are not prohibited but may likewise proceed if the local council of national defense, which is primarily the body best fitted to judge, finds them in the public interest or essential, and if this finding is approved by the War Industries Board. Building projects which do not measure up to these standards must be deferred until the war program is fulfilled. If they are not, the due fulfillment of the war program will be impossible.

The orders referred to are very much in the interest of the public, because they will prevent the public, including the trade, from planning or undertaking building projects and then, after plans or commitments have been made, finding that the war program makes it impossible to secure the materials necessary to complete them.

Moreover, the trade itself will find that because of the enormous housing and other construction work which the Government itself is undertaking a large part of the trade's facilities will simply be transferred to new lines of building activity.

Finally, the operation of the selective-service acts will much more than has already been the case directly affect the amount of labor available for the building trade and for other industries. Even with increased efficiency and female labor the natural outcome of this condition must be to curtail and reduce the volume of any given business not connected with the war program. As far as it is possible to do so, the less essential industries are being converted to more essential activities, but there will be a certain percentage of these industries which can not be so converted. Therefore the volume of business in the less essentials will be reduced, and with this reduction there will come a corresponding reduction in taxability.

It is not only the policy, it is the clear and simple duty, of the War Industries Board to see that the war program of the country is met, and this program must be met now, when its needs are upon us. This duty must be fulfilled, even if its fulfillment entails industrial loss in this country, as it does human loss abroad.

I have the honor to remain,

BERNARD M. BARUCH,
Chairman War Industries Board.

[P. C. Form 40.]

[War Industries Board, Priorities Division. Circular No. 21.]

NONWAR CONSTRUCTION.

To all manufacturers, jobbers, distributors, dealers, and consumers of building materials:

As far back as March 21, 1918, the following resolution was unanimously adopted and given wide publicity by the War Industries Board:

"Whereas it has come to the notice of this board that new industrial corporations are being organized in different sections of the United States for the erection of industrial plants which can not be utilized in the prosecution of the war; and

"Whereas plans are being considered by certain States, counties, cities, and towns for the construction of public buildings and other improvements which will not contribute toward winning the war; and

"Whereas the carrying forward of these activities will involve the utilization of labor, materials, and capital urgently required for war purposes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the War Industries Board, that in the public interest all new undertakings not essential to and not contributing either directly or indirectly toward winning the war, which involve the utilization of labor, material, and capital required in the production, supply, or distribution of direct or indirect war needs will be discouraged, notwithstanding they may be of local importance and of a character which should in normal times meet with every encouragement; and be it further

"Resolved, That in fairness to those interested therein, notice is hereby given that this board will withhold from such projects priority assistance, without which new construction of the character mentioned will frequently be found impracticable, and that this notice shall be given wide publicity, that all parties interested in such undertakings may be fully apprised of the difficulties and delays to which they will be subjected and embark upon them at their peril."

Since that time the manufacturers of the principal building materials, including paving brick, face brick, common brick, hollow tile, cement, and lime, have agreed to cooperate with the War Industries Board in carrying into effect the spirit of the foregoing resolution, and the individual manufacturers have signed and filed with the Priorities Division pledges, in writing, substantially as follows:

"The undersigned hereby pledges itself not to use, nor, so far as lies within its power, permit to be used, any products of its manufacture now in, or which may hereafter come into, its possession or control, save (a) for essential uses as that term has been or may be defined or applied from time to time by the Priorities Division of the War Industries Board, or (b) under permits in writing signed by or under authority of such Priorities Division; that it will make no sale or delivery of such products to any customer for resale until such customer has filed with it a similar pledge in writing; and that it will use its utmost endeavor to insure that its products shall be distributed solely for essential uses."

Similar pledges are exacted by manufacturers from their customers who purchase for resale.

That all interested in the manufacture and sale of building materials, as well as those interested in building projects of every character, may have a clear definition of or a ready means of ascertaining the uses to which such materials may be put, and be advised of building projects which may be prosecuted during the war with the approval of the War Industries Board, this circular is issued.

Structures, roads, or other construction projects falling within the following classifications are hereby approved, and no permits or licenses will be required therefor:

(1) After having first been cleared and approved by the War Industries Board, those undertaken directly by or under contract with the War Department or the Navy Department of the United States or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation of the United States Department of Labor, or the United States Housing Corporation;

(2) Repairs of or extensions to existing buildings involving in the aggregate a cost not exceeding $2,500;

(3) Roadways, buildings, and other structures undertaken by or under contract with the United States Railroad Administration or a railroad operated by such administration;

(4) Those directly connected with mines producing coal, metals, and ferro-alloy minerals; and

(5) Public-highway improvements and street pavements, when expressly approved in writing by the United States Highways Council.

No building project not falling within one of the foregoing classes shall be undertaken without a permit in writing issued by or under the authority of the Chief of the Nonwar Construction Section of the Priorities Division of the War Industries Board.

Should one contemplating building conceive his proposed project to be in the public interest or of such essentiality that under existing conditions it should not be deferred, then he will make a full statement of the facts in writing, under oath, and present same to the local representative of the Council of National Defense, applying to such representative for his approval of the proposed construction. Should such local representative approve the construction project, he will promptly transmit the application, stating clearly and fully his reason for approving same, to the chairman of the State council of defense for his consideration. If approved by the latter, he will transmit it to the Chief of the Nonwar Construction Section of the Priorities Division of the War Industries Board, Washington, D. C., for consideration, if need be further investigation, and final decision. Should the application be finally approved by the Priorities Division, a construction permit will issue which will constitute a warrant to manufacturers and dealers who have taken the pledges of cooperation above mentioned to sell and deliver building materials required in the construction of the licensed building project.

While it is not the policy of the Government to unnecessarily interfere with any legitimate business, industry, or construction project, it must be borne in mind that there is an imperative and constantly increasing demand for labor, material, and capital for the production and distribution of direct and indirect war needs, to satisfy which much nonwar construction must be deferred. A full realization of this fact by all loyal and patriotic citizens, including State and municipal authorities, is all that is required to postpone such construction activities as interfere with the war program. The State and local representatives of the Council of National Defense are with confidence depended upon to fully acquaint the whole people of these United States with the pressing need for the most rigid economy, measured not only in terms of dollars but in terms of labor, materials, and transportation service. The construction projects which must now be deferred may be undertaken when we shall have won the war and will then furnish employment to the returning artisan now on the battle front as well as those who will then be released by strictly war industries.

Yours, very truly,

EDWIN B. PARKER,
Priorities Commissioner.

Approved.

BERNARD M. BARUCH,
Chairman War Industries Board.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 3, 1918.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIRCULAR OF SEPTEMBER 10, 1918.

Circular No. 21 issued by the Priorities Division of the War Industries Board under date of September 3, 1918, dealing with nonwar construction, applies only to projected buildings and not to those already begun. Where a substantial portion of a building has already been constructed, manufacturers and distributors of and dealers in building materials may continue to furnish such materials for the completion of such buildings pending further action by the War Industries Board. The local representatives of the Council of National Defense are requested to make surveys of all building activities in their respective territories and report same as promptly as possible to their State chairmen, together with their recommendations concerning the necessity for the continuance of such construction or deferring same until after the war. The State chairmen will in turn forward such reports, with their recommendations, to D. R. McLennan, Chief of the Nonwar Construction Section of the Priorities Division of the War Industries Board, Washington, D. C.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 4, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. BARUCH: I am writing to ask if you will not accept appointment as chairman of the War Industries Board, and I am going to take the liberty at the same time of outlining the functions, the constitution, and action of the board, as I think they should be now established.

The functions of the board should be:

(1) The creation of new facilities and the disclosing, if necessary, the opening up of new or additional sources of supply.

(2) The conversion of existing facilities, where necessary, to new uses.

(3) The studious conservation of resources and facilities by scientific, commercial, and industrial economies.

(4) Advice to the several purchasing agencies of the Government with regard to the prices to be paid.

(5) The determination, wherever necessary, of priorities of production and of delivery and of the proportions of any given article to be made immediately accessible to the several purchasing agencies when the supply of that article is insufficient, either temporarily or permanently.

(6) The making of purchases for the allies.

The board should be constituted as at present and should retain, as far as necessary and so far as consistent with the character and purposes of the reorganization, its present advisory agencies; but the ultimate decision of all questions, except the determination of prices, should rest always with the chairman, the other members acting in a cooperative and advisory capacity. The further organization of advice I will indicate below.

In the determination of priorities of production, when it is not possible to have the full supply of any article that is needed produced at once, the chairman should be assisted and, so far as practicable, guided by the present priorities organization or its equivalent.

In the determination of priorities of delivery, when they must be determined, he should be assisted when necessary, in addition to the present advisory priorities organization, by the advice and cooperation of a committee constituted for the purpose and consisting of official representatives of the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Railway Administration, the Shipping Board, and the War Trade Board, in order that when a priority of delivery has been determined there may be common, consistent, and concerted action to carry it into effect.

In the determination of prices the chairman should be governed by the advice of a committee consisting, besides himself, of the members of the board immediately charged with the study of raw materials and of manufactured products, of the labor member of the board, of the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, the chairman of the Tariff Commission, and the Fuel Administrator.

The chairman should be constantly and systematically informed of all contracts, purchases, and deliveries, in order that he may always have before him schematized analysis of the progress of business in the several supply divisions of the Government in all departments.

The duties of the chairman are:

(1) To act for the joint and several benefit of all the supply departments of the Government.

(2) To let alone what is being successfully done and interfere as little as possible with the present normal processes of purchase and delivery in the several departments.

(3) To guide and assist wherever the need for guidance or assistance may be revealed; for example, in the allocation of contracts, in obtaining access to materials in any way preempted, or in the disclosure of sources of supply.

(4) To determine what is to be done when there is any competitive or other conflict of interest between departments in the matter of supplies; for example, when there is not a sufficient immediate supply for all and there must be a decision as to priority of need or delivery or when there is competition for the same source of manufacture or supply or when contracts have not been placed in such a way as to get advantage of the full productive capacity of the country.

(5) To see that contracts and deliveries are followed up where such assistance as is indicated under (3) and (4) above has proved to be necessary.

(6) To anticipate the prospective needs of the several supply departments of the Government and their feasible adjustment to the industry of the country as far in advance as possible, in order that as definite an outlook and opportunity for planning as possible may be afforded the business men of the country.

In brief, he should act as the general eye of all supply departments in the field of industry.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. BERNARD M. BARUCH,
Washington, D. C.

EXECUTIVE PROCLAMATION OF MAY 28, 1918.

I hereby establish the War Industries Board as a separate administrative agency to act for me and under my direction. This is the board which was originally formed by and subsidiary to the Council of National Defense under the provisions of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, approved August 29, 1916.

The functions, duties, and powers of the War Industries Board, as outlined in my letter of March 4, 1918, to Bernard M. Baruch, Esq., its chairman, shall be, and hereby are, continued in full force and effect.

WOODROW WILSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, Mr. DIXON, Mr. FORDNEY, and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented the memorial of C. D. Shepard, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, relative to the income-tax situation for United States citizens residing in Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Charles F. Falk, of Two Harbors, Minn., and the memorial of M. D. Martin, of Northfield, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on nonbeverage alcohol, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Northern Display Advertising Co. of Minnesota, of Minneapolis, Minn., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from C. A. Marshall, of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on outdoor advertisements, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Rosenthal & Falk, of Crookston, Minn., and a memorial of Sam M. Field, of Moorhead, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on shoes selling for more than $10 per pair, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of local branch, Railway Mail Association, of Kansas City, Kans., praying for the fixing of a standard day of employment for railway postal clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the bar association of Wyandotte County, Kans., remonstrating against the proposed scheme of local board compensation and appropriations providing for the payments therein proposed, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Loyal Legion of the State of Kansas, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the creation in the War and Navy Departments of a roll designated as "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DREW. I present the memorial of Hon. Henry W. Blair, a resident of the city of Manchester, in my State, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

I have the honor to inclose letters to the late lamented Senator Gallinger and to the Washington Times bearing upon the important subject of illiteracy in this country which he proposed to use in the further discussion of a bill reported by Senator SMITH of Georgia in the way of contradiction and explanation of highly misleading statements made in debate by himself and other Senators on the bill on the 25th day of last March, and perhaps on other days. Of this he emphatically assured me at least four different times, but the debate was not resumed and other opportunity did not occur during his lifetime. I also inclose brief additional matter, as follows, upon the necessity of the future general education of the masses of the people of the world if this war is to result in the destruction of autocracy and lasting democratic government and desirable peace.

I respectfully request the insertion of this in the RECORD and appropriate action as an act of justice to the memory of Senator Gallinger as well as to the truth of history, as my letter to the Washington Times clearly shows. From the nature of things the subject matter must dominate any rational action by an international conference or alliance, which must end this war and establish democracy as the ruling form of government among the nations of the earth.

Very early action would seem to be necessary or the errors will become history and fair corrections would have the same publicity as the original errors of fact in debate.

The action of the "unspeakable Turk" in destroying existing schools—English, American, French, and even Russian schools—even while war is waging, and their proposed perpetual extinction shows that our enemies comprehend the nature of this war better than we do.

The following item was recently published in a local newspaper:

"THE HAGUE, NETHERLANDS, June 29.

"Djemal Pasha, Turkish ambassador in Syria, one of the most influential leaders of the Young Turks, stated recently in an interview in a review called "German Policy" that all American, English, French, and Russian schools in Syria and Palestine already had been closed and he would never allow them to reopen after the war.

"He regarded this as an indispensable step toward the rooting out of entente influence in the post-bellum period. Jewish colonization, he declared, was equally injurious and he would do his utmost to oppose it.

"The review, dated June 8, has only just arrived through a secret route. It is believed the German Government forbade sending copies abroad, owing to its anti-Jewish character."

Whatever else is neglected or delayed let the Congress and the President seasonably attend to this. No public man has done it or proposed it to my knowledge.

The foremost man on earth has stated the issue in this war to be the overthrow of autocracy; that is, government of all by the few; or by democracy, which is the government of the people by themselves.

This is government of the people, by the people, for the people. All else is tyranny or the mob. But for this issue we have no business in this war.

There can be and there shall be no permanent peace on earth among men until the people know enough to govern themselves.

Autocracies govern by force. Democracies must be even more intelligent than tyrannies or kings, for there must be intelligent force exercised by the masses of the people in government by democracies. The majority of the people will seek their own good. Intelligence only is death to autocracy.

Of what use is a peace which does not require that every child born into the world of every nation and for all generations shall be forever entitled to be vested with the right to a good, common-school education at the public expense? This much at least. It is the cornerstone of democracy.

The expenditure in common schools of one-hundredth part of the loss in treasure to date would have prevented any war, to say nothing of the blood of men and of the works of thousands of years of civilization with unknown billions yet to come, which not only would have prevented any war but would have qualified every child for liberty and would have established the system all over the world.

Nothing but the good government and the increased productive power which democracy alone can give will prevent the bankruptcy of nations by debts contracted and damage already done.

For God's sake and for man's sake proclaim the right of every child born into the world to a free common-school education as the first and indispensible condition of peace.

You alone can do it for you are the most powerful intelligent human force, and therefore you alone have the opportunity and beyond all the love and respect of mankind and with these the responsibility.

If it be not done this war is but a preliminary skirmish to what is to come. And our country and those representing it will be forever disgraded and destroyed without remedy.

Letter to Hon. J. H. Gallinger:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1918.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR GALLINGER: In debate upon the Senate bill to appropriate $50,000 for the education of soldiers too illiterate to read their military manuals or to understand orders from their officers, reported unanimously from the Committee on Education on the 25th of March, reference was made by you to the Blair education bill, to the effect that if it had become a law such an appropriation would have been unnecessary, and you believe that the amount proposed to be expended by the Blair bill was some six or seven million dollars.

Senator SMITH withdrew his bill before any reported action and moved the passage of a House bill appropriating the same amount, to wit, $50,000, for the same purpose.

Upon the House bill there was some debate preceding its passage by the Senate in which marked general lack of information in regard to the scope and purpose of the Blair bill became evident, of which historical justice requires a brief correction—sufficient at least so that the wide discussions of that measure, which continued for 10 years in the Congress and the country, may not be lost in further deliberations upon the most important question which concerns our country and the world, to wit, the removal of illiteracy from the masses of the people in order that democracy may maintain itself against autocratic power.

There will never be permanent peace until the common school is a world-wide institution. The action of March 25 upon the Senate bill was promptly reported in the Washington Times and the press generally. I at once wrote a letter to the Times, but before it could be published the second debate, which was upon the House bill, had occurred, and it became necessary to ask its publication, with slight enlargement, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an act of justice to all.

I shall very highly appreciate the exercise of your proverbial courtesy in this matter, and remain, as ever,

Your friend,

(Signed) HENRY W. BLAIR.

Letter to the editor of the Washington Times:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 26, 1918.

To the EDITOR OF THE WASHINGTON TIMES.

DEAR SIR: In your issue on the third page, under the head "What Congress did yesterday," I find education for illiterates now and under the Blair bill. * * * Senator SMITH of Georgia called up the subject of educating illiterate drafted men. Senator Gallinger dexterously reminded him that the Southern States had defeated the Blair bill for eradicating illiteracy at the South at national expense. The subject went over without recording the fact that the solid South objected to the Blair bill as intended to apply chiefly to colored Republicans, when it was said they were too illiterate to vote. I wrote every line of the Blair bill and did what I could in a 10-year war to secure its passage.

It applied equally to all illiterates, white and black, as shown by the census of 1880, north and south throughout the whole country. I believed it more important to educate the white illiterate than the colored, because there were more of them, and also because the negro could never rise through the strata of white ignorance above him until education had dissolved it. I was therefore more anxious for the education of my own race, and still am so, than for that of colored illiterates. Both should go on together.

The motives of its author and of its supporters generally were not political. Education of the illiterate white people and their children would make twice as many Republicans as educating the colored alone. The bill was not intended to apply to the colored Republicans chiefly, but to all alike; and, combined with State funds, the same amount of money was provided for each illiterate.

There was then, as now, an immense, growing and most dangerous mass of illiteracy at the North as well as at the South.

If the bill had become a law there would be no need of educating 700,000 white soldiers so that they can read their manuals and understand orders while they are fighting and dying to establish democracy and free schools everywhere else save in their own country.

Lastly, a large majority of the Southern United States Senators and, I believe, in the House, although it was not brought to a vote in the House, strongly supported the Blair bill.

No greater speeches were ever made in the Senate than by Senators Lamar, Pugh, Garland, Hampton, Jackson, Gibson, Vance, George, Ransom, Barbour, and many others, all for this bill.

No pretended history was ever more falsely written than that of the Blair bill.

In my firm belief its defeat cost Tom Reed the Presidency. Booker T. Washington and great influences behind him, after having supported, did their utmost to defeat the Blair bill.

The bill proposed temporary, but not permanent, aid, $120,000,000 during the 10 years of its operation under State administration, averaging $12,000,000 yearly, when it was believed the schools would become self-sustaining in all the States. This aggregate was reduced to $80,000,000, as finally amended, when it was defeated for the want of one vote in the Senate. The United States had no supervision or control further than to see that the law was complied with or the funds forfeited to the use of other States.

It is not strange that you have been misled in regard to this important measure of a past generation, for its inside history is comparatively unknown; but these errors are so serious and the subject so increasingly and permanently of world-wide importance if this war is to be won and not wasted, that I could not honestly permit them to pass uncorrected. Temporary national and international aid to common schools is the foundation and guaranty of free institutions, and their only sure defense against autocratic and anarchistic power. Hereafter the education of children will be considered as important as begetting them, for without moral and intellectual training either autocracy or anarchy will render human existence an eternal curse.

The discussions of the Blair bill were the turning point in the greatest of all wars, that for the spread and preservation of the public-school system for the free education in the common branches of knowledge of every normal child born into the world.

There will never be permanent peace on earth until the principles of the Blair education bill are made the basis of unity in the treaties and conventions which are to control the future relations of men. The common or public school will always insure a virtuous and intelligent majority as the governing force in a democracy. Common schools for the world! International agreements efficiently enforced need guarantee nothing more, for once established self-interest will always maintain them in the several nations.

Let us then have peace, but not until we have free common schools, for without them there can be no true democracy.

The passage of the Blair bill would have cost $80,000,000 as finally amended, but it would have prevented this war; it would have saved the world to date, $120,000,000,000 of money and millions of lives, and there can be no estimate of what is to come. It would have doubled the wealth of the South, if not of our whole country, and it would have established free schools as the missionary societies spread Christianity all over the world, and free democratic institutions forever. What a field for private charity, like the Bible and other great societies!

A blunder may be worse than a crime in its consequences. To repeat a blunder is always a crime.

Yours truly,

(Signed) HENRY W. BLAIR.

Wherefore your petitioner, a citizen of the United States, residing in the city of Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire, respectfully memoralizes the Congress and prays that the several prayers of his memorial be granted, and especially that the present war shall be waged until systems of free common schools are established throughout all nations who will adhere to them, are parties to a democratic peace which shall be pledged forever to maintain them.

HENRY W. BLAIR,
Room 801, Colorado Building.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 18, 1918.

THIRD LIBERTY LOAN.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, on April 27 of this year the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] delivered an address at my home in Brooklyn on the then third liberty-loan drive. That speech was afterwards printed in the RECORD. I am just in receipt of a copy of a letter from the gentleman who had charge of that meeting, addressed to the Senator from Oklahoma, which I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MANUFACTURERS' TRUST CO.,
Brooklyn, N. Y., September 19, 1918.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The address delivered by you during the third liberty-loan drive acted as and was, indeed, an inspiration to all those who heard your message. The sentiments expressed should surely help in bringing about successful results in the flotation of the fourth liberty loan.

We must have no double allegiance, no divided loyalty, no fifty-fifty fidelity. Each and every person should participate to the full extent of his capacity and do his "bit" by subscribing now for bonds.

Brooklyn will again help to put the fourth liberty loan "over the top."

Sincerely,

NATHAN S. JONAS, President.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I send to the desk a memorial, which I ask to have read and printed in the RECORD. This memorial is signed by the president and the secretary of the American National Live Stock Association and the different members of what is known as the market committee of that association.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, was it the request that the memorial be printed in the RECORD or that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. KENDRICK. It was that it be read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request was that the memorial be read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to explain his objection. This is a very brief memorial and it is signed by the representatives of thousands of people who are interested in the live-stock industry. I think the Senator from Utah will remember, for he is on the Committee on Printing, that I have not transgressed the rules of the Senate by asking to have either petitions, memorials, or any other form of document printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], has just entered the Chamber, and I am quite sure that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has heard the statement which has been so many times made by the Senator from Arizona in relation to the printing of petitions and memorials in the RECORD. If we print one, we might as well print all of them that come; and if we print all of them that come to the Senate, the RECORD will be more than half filled with petitions and memorials. The Senator from Arizona has stated time and again that he intended to object to the printing in the RECORD of all petitions and memorials unless they fell under the practice; that is, that they come from municipalities, from officials of a State, or from a State government. That has been his attitude and that has been the attitude of the Committee on Printing. It is therefore my duty, not my pleasure, I will say to the Senator, to object to the printing of this memorial in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall this memorial be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, before that motion is voted upon I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Parliamentarily, should not the motion to print come from the proponent? I have noticed, in reading the RECORD, that the Chair puts the question whether or not the proponent presses the question to a vote in the Senate. I therefore desire to ask whether it is the duty of the Chair, under the rule, to put the question without the motion being made by the proponent himself?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Wyoming would not have presented this memorial and asked to have it printed in the RECORD unless he desired that that should be done. On objection, the Chair thinks it is the duty of the Chair to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I desire that the Chair shall bear with me for just a moment on that proposition. There are many Senators who feel impelled to ask unanimous consent for printing matter in the RECORD because that request has been made of them. A Senator himself can not do less than ask for what the petitioners request him to do. Then, if the Senator presenting the petition is satisfied with the action of the Senate and with our effort to prevent the enormous expense of this public RECORD, he is ready to abide by that decision of the Senate; but if the Chair puts the motion, although the Senator originally preferring the request is not pressing it, it puts on the committee and those who are trying to protect the RECORD from this expense the double burden of watchfulness and of the frequent calling of the roll that otherwise would not happen unless the Chair, on his own motion, puts the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, two such matters have gone in the RECORD this morning without a word being said.

Mr. SMOOT. Petitions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. There is not very much watchfulness here. The Chair is going to stand by his ruling. All in favor of printing the matter in the RECORD will say "aye."

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; let us have a division.

Mr. KENDRICK. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him during that absence. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. THOMAS (after having voted in the negative). I notice the absence from the Chamber of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I transfer the pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH. I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire if the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. STERLING. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The roll call resulted—yeas 29, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Trammell
Calder	Kendrick	Owen	Vardaman
Culberson	King	Poindexter	Walsh

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. GERRY entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KIRBY entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is whether the petition presented by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] shall be inserted in the RECORD. On that question the yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martin, Ky.	Shafroth
Calder	Henderson	Myers	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Sterling

So Mr. KENDRICK's motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial presented by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The memorial is as follows:

A MEMORIAL REGARDING THE REPORT OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ON MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

To the President of the United States, to Congress, and to the Federal Trade Commission:

The live-stock producers of this Nation in a spirit of loyal service wish to give their utmost efforts to assist our Government in winning this war. The most practical service which we believe they can render is to produce an adequate supply of meat animals for the military and civilian needs of ourselves and allies, and to aid in opening the channels of distribution so as to free the industry completely from practices which have encouraged the growth of monopoly and special privilege.

The market committee of the American National Live Stock Association were fully conversant with the critical meat situation at home and abroad, and the menace to the food supply of the Nation which existed when the President on February 7, 1916, directed the Federal Trade Commission to make its investigation, and later, on March 18, 1918, when, at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Hoover, he appointed a committee of five capable members of his own official family to determine a "positive national live-stock policy." The extremely unsatisfactory conditions prevailing in the live-stock business fully justified the action of the President in both instances, as well as the action of Congress in appropriating the necessary funds.

After carefully considering the report of the Federal Trade Commission, the American National Live Stock Association, through its market committee, and on behalf of the live-stock producers of the country, desires to express to the President, to Congress, and to the commission its deep appreciation of the fearless, convincing, and constructive summary of the report of the commission on the meat-packing industry and to express its belief that both producers and consumers should unite in vigorous support of the prompt enactment of appropriate legislation to carry into effect constructive policies and remedies of the character recommended by the commission.

The misrepresentation of the recommendations, which has been given widespread publicity, must not be permitted to mislead either Congress or the people. The commission did not recommend that the packing plants of the five large packers should be taken over by the Government. It did recommend that these packers should be deprived of the means by which they have acquired and maintained their monopolistic control of the live-stock markets and of meats and a constantly increasing list of other food products. It did recommend that the transportation, terminal, and distribution facilities of the country should be taken out of the hands of the monopolists and be made available on equal terms to open competition.

We have also carefully considered the report of the committee of five, and thoroughly indorse the idea of a positive national live-stock policy. It must be borne in mind, however, that the report of the committee of five is essentially a war measure, while the report of the Federal Trade Commission relates more especially to the permanent conditions that should prevail after the close of hostilities. While we deeply regret that the report of the committee of five did not touch on the great question of production, we especially commend that portion of it which dealt with the necessity for a uniform system of accounting in the packers' industry, the regulation of stockyards and commission men by the Department of Agriculture, the advisability of greater publicity regarding wholesale prices of meats, and the need of an investigation into the conditions of the retail trade; and we strongly urge the early appointment of a commission clothed with ample power to investigate thoroughly this situation and present a definite plan for a simplification of retail distribution which will assure the consumer a wholesome meat supply under a system free from waste and needless expense; and, most important of all, we indorse the need of a revision of the packers' license, being thoroughly convinced that the welfare of the live-stock industry and the consuming public demands effective regulation of the packers' entire business instead of only a portion.

We therefore respectfully, but earnestly, urge the prompt and favorable consideration by Congress of the remedies recommended by the Federal Trade Commission.

Adopted September 17, 1918.

Mr. ASHURST subsequently said: Mr. President, I may be in error, but I should like to inquire if under the motion a few moments ago to print in the RECORD the memorial presented by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] it was not to be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. I am satisfied. I am not complaining.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very good. Then let us go on. Are there further petitions and memorials?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to give notice to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that hereafter I shall not object to requests to print in the RECORD. Senators can present stuff that will require a thousand pages of the RECORD each day, as far as I am personally concerned. I do not want the chairman of the Printing Committee to expect me hereafter to object to anything being printed in the RECORD. Let us notify the country that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is open to exploit the views of anyone upon any question.

ACTIVITIES OF BREWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, there is before the Senate a resolution calling for a certain report from the Custodian of Alien Property, which has not yet been made to the Senate, I believe, although I understand the facts called for have been furnished to Members of the Senate. I do not think the record in that case would be complete without the publication of the following, which I am informed is a correct copy of a letter which emanated from the White House last spring, a few days before politics had been officially adjourned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no resolution here calling upon anyone to make a report on this question, the Chair will state. If the Senator is presenting it as a memorial, the Chair will ask if there is objection to having it read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand that the Senator presents a memorial or a letter?

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read.

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is not a petition, it is not in order, and I raise a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. NEW. I present it as a memorial, as a part of my remarks, and should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is out of order. He has no right to make remarks. The Chair sustains the point of order. Petitions and memorials are in order.

"TWO THOUSAND QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a communication which I have received in relation to the matter brought up by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the other day concerning the circulation of the book entitled "Two Thousand Questions and Answers," and then I should like to make a remark about it. I ask that the name of the writer be omitted in the reading. I am willing to give it in confidence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, September 16, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRANDEGEE: I have just received from the Review of Reviews Co. a circular letter offering a book called "Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War" to those who subscribe to the Review of Reviews or renew their subscriptions. The envelope bearing this matter bears on the front the following words in large black type: "Q. Did the Germans warn the passengers on the Lusitania?"

That this is an insidious form of German propaganda there can be no doubt, and I bring it to your attention, believing that you will deal with the matter appropriately and vigorously.

Very faithfully, yours,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I understood from the matter that was inserted in the RECORD here to-day at the time when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] brought this question to the attention of the Senate that this book, Two Thousand Questions and Answers, had been revised so that it was fit for publication and circulation. If this revised edition is being circulated through the United States mail, or if the prospective or circular advertising it is being circulated through the United States mail with that question on the envelope, it is perfectly evident what the intention is. It is the intention to convey the impression to the reader that if the passengers on the Lusitania had been warned by the Germans the Germans had a right to blow up the Lusitania and murder the men, women, and children who were aboard her. That is the intimation and the sole purpose of asking the question.

I do not know whose business it is to stop the publication from circulating through this country, and therefore I trust that if there is a Government official charged with the duty, bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate will cause him to take some action in the premises.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have a short petition here, which is in four lines, as follows:

To the United States Senate:

As a citizen of the United States who believes the world can not be made safe for democracy while American women are denied the vote, in the name of justice I urge the immediate adoption of the Susan B. Anthony suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution by the United States Senate.

I will state that the petition is signed by several thousand citizens of the State of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator might just as well have the names printed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not care to have the names printed, but will say that among the signers are many of the most eminent and prominent citizens of our State.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask for an order regarding committee service.

First I ask that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] may, at his own request, be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Canadian Relations; that the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] may, at his own request, be relieved from further duty upon the Committee on Indian Affairs; and that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] may, at his own request, be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT The Chair hears no objection, and the Senators named are excused from further service upon the committees indicated.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. DREW] be assigned to membership on the following committees: Library, Printing, Indian Affairs, Canadian Relations, Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

DISINTERMENT OF BODIES.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12429) to authorize the health officer of the District of Columbia to permit the disinterment of the bodies of Eliza Hill Bowles, Bernice Worthen Bowles, and Bessie Vivian Bowles, and I submit a report (No. 573) thereon, and ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such directions and precautions as he may adopt, to permit William C. Bowles to disinter, remove, and reinter the bodies of his deceased children, Eliza Hill Bowles, buried October 7, 1893; Bernice Worthen Bowles, buried October 18, 1893; and Bessie Vivian Bowles, buried October 18, 1893; all of whom died from diphtheria and were buried in Congressional Cemetery in said District, but such permit shall not be issued unless there has been filed in the health department of the District of Columbia a permit from the proper governmental authorities at the place where the reinterment is to be made, authorizing said interment there of the said remains.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4950) regulating the personnel in the Coast Artillery bands; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 4951) fixing a limitation of time for bringing suits against the United States in certain cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 4952) granting an increase of pension to John B. Way (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 4953) granting an increase in appropriation to all State and Territorial soldiers' and sailors' homes from $100 per year for each inmate to $150 per year for each inmate thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SARAH A. STAPLIN.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 308), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Sarah A. Staplin, sister of William Gardiner, late assistant clerk to the Committee on Pacific Railroads of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

DEEP WATERWAYS SYSTEM FROM DULUTH TO NEW YORK.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I submit a Senate resolution and ask unanimous consent to proceed to its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 309) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce, together with the Chief of the Division of Inland Waterways of the Railroad Administration, is hereby directed to furnish for the use of the Senate such information as is available from public or private sources, without expense, concerning the advantage and value to the commerce of the country of the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of canals connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario and the latter lake with the Hudson River by way of the New York State Barge Canal from Oswego to Troy, to complete the deep waterways system from Duluth to New York, such report to include, so far as available, estimated costs of development of same, respectively, as 30-foot deep canals, what relief will be thereby afforded to lines of existing rail transportation, the extent to which such canals would probably be utilized by the commerce of the country, the incidental value thereof as assisting the national defense, and any other economic advantages and uses such canals would serve.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from New York tell me the other authority besides the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. CALDER. The Inland Waterways Division of the Railroad Administration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not the slightest objection to the resolution. It occurs to me, however, that inasmuch as it calls for estimates of expenses, and so forth, the Army engineers ought to be consulted in the matter. Perhaps the Secretary of Commerce can consult them. I assume that it would incur some expense to make the survey and estimate.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this resolution is almost identical with one adopted by the Senate a few days ago at the request of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] dealing with other inland waterway matters. I doubt if the inquiry will be an expensive job.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. If it merely calls for some consideration of the matter and some investigation and report by the Secretary of Commerce it might be profitable to have it undertaken, but I gather from the reading of the resolution that it contemplates an estimate of the cost of a 30-foot canal connecting the Lakes and the Hudson River. I do not see how that can be done unless you have a very extensive survey and a pretty expensive investigation. Does the resolution contemplate that there may be an appropriation to do the work?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution says "without expense." Is there objection to its consideration?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to getting the information.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not object to this resolution, but Senators may have forgotten that some four or five years ago the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President to enter into relations with the Canadian and British Governments looking to the construction of a waterway for ocean-going ships from Duluth to Montreal, covering a large portion of the distance contemplated in this resolution, but also continuing it farther, to the city of Montreal, where they already have an ocean way. I wish we might know exactly what, if anything, was done with the former resolution, which I introduced, and what action the President took in reference to it, because I believe it is of the very greatest importance. It is well known that Canada has been discussing a deep-water canal system to connect the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River by way of the Ottawa River route, which I think would be most unfortunate to the United States.

I happen to know, Mr. President, that this matter has been receiving very serious consideration in the Dominion. It has been interfered with somewhat on account of the war. There is a party or a division of people in Canada who want an ocean channel by way of Lake Erie, through the Welland Canal enlarged, and to Lake Ontario. Another party wish to keep the canal altogether on Canadian territory and therefore propose to connect Green Bay and the Ottawa River with the St. Lawrence. Senators can realize how important it is that the former should be encouraged by us because it would be no less beneficial to Canada and of great benefit to the United States.

I wish that this question might be considered seriously, because I can conceive of nothing that is more emphasized even in this time of war by our country's needs.

It would very largely solve the question of transportation rates; it would relieve freight congestion; it would be a military advantage by furnishing a cheap and efficient outlet to the sea, the demonstration for the need of which has been made so many times of late.

We have had this matter investigated by Army engineers, surveys have been made, and volumes of engineers' reports have been made with reference to the work. While one of the most complete reports advises that the expense would be very great, yet more recent information shows that that waterway could be developed for ships at practically no expense to either country. A few years ago a New York corporation wanted to build a dam for the purpose of developing water power in the Long Soo Rapids. The proposition then submitted was that it would construct dams under plans approved by the Army engineers of the United States in such a way as to subserve the interests of deep-water navigation, and without expense to the Government. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that the proposition, which is not involved in the one presented by the Senator from New York, but in the one that was brought up the other day, which proposes to allow some corporation, or the Government itself, to develop water power in the St. Lawrence River purely for power purposes, will not be looked upon with favor unless there can be associated with it the navigation project. It is a look into the future, but it ought to be observed. We ought to take into consideration the interests of both countries. It is a mutual proposition; it is in boundary waters, and to preserve good feeling between the two countries the problem ought to be international and ought to be solved jointly. The two countries must work in harmony, for their interests are common. There is no valid reason why ships of deepest draft should not ply between Liverpool and Duluth. The administration should exercise the power which it already has to take the preliminary steps in this great improvement. I do not object to this resolution because it is somewhat along the lines of the project I have mentioned—it has in view an ocean way from Duluth to the foot of Lake Ontario, and there remains only the distance between Ontario and Montreal, in the St. Lawrence River, to be improved, and that is the natural water outlet for our foreign commerce. Nature has builded it for us, practically, although there are some obstructions to be removed; but those obstructions will themselves furnish the means of financing the development.

I repeat, it is a big proposition, and it is one that I had hoped would be submitted to the International Waterways Commission or to the Canadian Government itself, for it would have been welcomed. There is not any doubt about it. I know somewhat the sentiment over there. The question ought to be considered, and by both Governments. It ought to have received practical attention long ago.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say, in reply to the remarks that have been made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], that a short time ago I read in the public press that a company had made application to the International Waterways Commission for the improvement of the Soo Rapids, in the St. Lawrence River, and that the commission had granted them the right to make the improvement. Their improvement, as I recall it, was to create a water power and to leave the main channel of the St. Lawrence River in good navigable condition. It was stated that the Canadian Government had objected to the proposition on the ground that it was a matter that did not belong to the commission, that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the commission. I simply refer to the subject because it was called to my attention.

Now, I want to say a word to my friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I am not opposed to his resolution, I am in favor of it, but I think he is calling on the wrong department for the information. The Commerce Department is not the department that has any data of any practical value at hand in reference to the matter. His resolution ought to be addressed to the Secretary of War. The Engineer Corps of the War Department has ample data, and, in many cases, has estimates of the cost of such improvements. As to the very proposition to which the Senator refers in respect to a route from the barge canal up into Lake Ontario and from there around on the American side by way of Buffalo, I think the Senator will find a report of the engineering department in respect to that subject. If the Senator desires to secure the information and the data for which he asks in the resolution, I think it would be a mistake not to address it to the War Department. If it were my resolution and I wanted that information, that is the department to which I would address it.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I might say I was prompted to prepare the resolution in the way it has been presented because a resolution which was adopted a few days ago on motion of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], dealing with inland waterways, was directed to the Department of Commerce. I added the Inland Waterways Division of the Railroad Administration, of course, because I know they are making a study of the proposition involved in my resolution. If, however, it is the judgment of Senators here that the information can best be obtained from the War Department, I have no objection to substituting the War Department for the Department of Commerce. I know that the other resolution was addressed to the Department of Commerce, and that prompted me to frame this resolution in the same words; but if the Senator, in his wide experience, thinks it is better for the War Department to handle the matter, I shall not object.

Mr. NELSON. I certainly think it would be better, and that the Senator from New York would get more complete information in the quickest time from the War Department. That is my opinion.

Now, in respect to the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal improvement, I will say that that canal has been repeatedly surveyed; estimates have been made; and the matter has been considered by the Committee on Commerce. I apprehend all the information that the Department of Commerce could furnish on that subject would be simply as to the commercial advantages of the route; and there is no dispute about those. The question involved in the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal, that has hung up the matter, is the taking over of an old company; a company which has built a canal there, and which has been charging tolls; and it is a question of buying out that company. That has been the matter in controversy. We have in the Senate twice, I think—at least once—put a provision into a bill for purchasing that canal, for the Government taking it over, improving it, enlarging it, and making it a ship canal; but the other House has refused to agree to the proposition; and so it has failed. The company is in a bad situation. Undoubtedly the canal ought to be taken over, improved, and converted into a ship canal; but, as I have said, the incubus that has delayed the matter, the question that has caused controversy between the two Houses, has been as to the acquisition of the rights of the old company.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, carrying out the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the Department of Commerce——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Chair desires first to put the question: Is there objection to the request for the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the consideration of the resolution, but the Senator from New York referred to a precedent having been established with reference to a resolution concerning the Coast Canal; and perhaps it is best to leave the Senator's resolution in its present shape. If it goes into the hands of the War Department, and if he asks for a report from that department, it is going to take a long time and considerable investigation; there is no question about that. I rather think that the Senator had better leave his resolution stand as he has offered it.

Mr. CALDER. Very well; then I will not change the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York for the present consideration of the resolution? There being no objection, it is before the Senate. The resolution has been read. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

THE REVENUE.

H. R. 12863. An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I give notice that on Monday, after the close of the morning business, I shall take occasion to address myself to certain features of the measure which I believe are inconsistent with constitutional provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The morning business is closed.

ACTIVITIES OF BREWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to make a point of order.

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator from Iowa withhold his suggestion for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will agree to withhold the point of order for a moment.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, addressing myself to the motion to take up the unfinished business, I desire to read what I believe to be an accurate copy of a letter which purports to have been issued from the White House on the 14th day of May, very shortly after politics had been officially adjourned. The letter is addressed to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, and reads as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 14, 1918.

MY DEAR BRISBANE: When you were at the White House offices today I forgot to ask you to send me the Chicago Herald and Examiner regularly to my office here. I am sure you are going to make the same good Democratic fight in Chicago that you have been making in your paper in Washington, and I want to see just how you do it.

Sincerely, yours,

J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

Mr. President, I have thought it well to have that letter in the RECORD, and I hope that it will be referred to the committee along with certain other papers relating to the subject of the purchase of the Washington Times, concerning which a demand has been made upon the Alien Property Custodian.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection to having the unfinished business laid before the Senate, but before it is considered and before anything is done under that order, I desire to have a quorum of the Senate present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, the first question is, Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida that the unfinished business be considered at this time?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Myers	Sterling
Bankhead	Henderson	Nelson	Thomas
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	King	Shafroth	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kirby	Sheppard	Wilfley
Fall	McKellar	Shields	Williams
Fletcher	McNary	Simmons
France	Martin, Va.	Smoot

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 38 Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. GUION, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But 47 Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. LODGE, Mr. DREW, and Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, Thursday afternoon of this week, the day before yesterday, there was extended debate in the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Forida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the effect that the Senate disagree to the House amendment to the pending bill—the water-power bill—and send it to conference.

I was not present during much of the debate. I was compelled, by important departmental business, to leave the Chamber soon after the debate began, and I did not return until about the time it closed. I am sorry I was not present during all of the debate. That debate, I have since learned, took a wide range, covering not only the subject of water-power legislation and the procedure of the House and the Senate on matters pending between the two branches of Congress, but relating to the oil-land leasing bill, which is now in conference between the two branches of Congress, and relating to the attitude and actions of the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the oil-land leasing bill, now and for a long time past in conference between the two branches of Congress, over which there is apparently a deadlock in conference and in which conference it appears that the opinions of those three Cabinet officials have figured to some extent, and the debate also covered many other subjects, some of them of a personal nature.

It appears that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] spoke several times during the debate that afternoon. I am sorry that I was not present to hear him. I was compelled by urgent official business to leave the Chamber about the time the Senator from Colorado took the floor to make his first talk, and I was compelled to be away quite a considerable length of time and did not return to the Chamber until about the time the Senator from Colorado made the closing remarks of his last address. I wish I had been present during all of that time, but owing to matters not under my control I could not be. The Senate was not in session yesterday, and it has just come to my knowledge since I entered the Chamber this afternoon, from an inspection of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, the 19th instant, that a good deal was said during that debate—said principally by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]—about the attitude and actions of the Secretary of the Interior in regard to certain legislation and about a controversy between the Secretary of the Interior and other departments of the Government.

As I say, just in the last few minutes that matter has come to my attention. I knew nothing of it until I entered the Chamber this afternoon, and I have not yet had time to read all that there is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 19th instant on the subject; but I have read enough to learn something of the nature of the remarks which involved the Secretary of the Interior and the action of some other departments of the Government, and, although I have not read all that was said, I can not let this occasion pass without making some remarks on some things said here Thursday afternoon about the Secretary of the Interior. I feel that it is my duty to do so. Had I been here at the time, I would have made immediate reply. I now do so at the very first opportunity.

I see from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] read into the RECORD, in the course of his remarks, some statements about Secretary of the Interior Lane made by Mr. Kearful, of the Department of Justice, before the House Committee on Public Lands some months ago while it was considering the oil-land leasing bill; and I have read the most of Mr. Kearful's statements, so quoted in the RECORD of the 19th. I think Mr. Kearful's language on that occasion was an outrageous and most unjustifiable assault upon a high official of this Government, who stands as high as any man in the United States for probity, integrity, honor, and honesty, whose reputation is above reproach, whose official conduct has been animated by the purest of motives, and whose every action does embody and is regarded by the people of the United States as embodying absolute integrity and honesty as well as sound judgment and an intention to do justice.

I had heard some months ago something of the attack which Mr. Kearful made upon the Secretary of the Interior in his statement before that committee, but I had never seen it nor seen any part of it until this afternoon. I did not think enough of it to get a copy of the hearing before the House committee and read it. I did not attach any importance to it. I think it was entirely out of place when made before the committee, that it was wholly unjustified and unwarranted by anything Secretary Lane had done, and was a gross violation of propriety; and I am sorry the Senator from Colorado dignified it by quoting from it and having parts of it put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. With great respect for the distinguished Senator from Colorado, whom I hold in high regard and for whose motives in all things I have high regard, I think he erred in putting those statements of Mr. Kearful in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think it was an improper thing to do.

I see in the remarks of the Senator from Colorado that he takes exception to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior has made no reply to the assault made upon him on that occasion by Mr. Kearful and has taken no notice whatever of it. I think the Secretary of the Interior acted with eminent dignity and entire propriety in ignoring the assault made upon him by Mr. Kearful. I think it was entirely proper for him to ignore it. I think it was beneath the notice and the dignity of the Secretary of the Interior. I do not believe the honorable Secretary of the Interior has to make reply to or take any notice of any such assault upon him to vindicate or justify himself before the people of the United States. I believe that his reputation and his character are such as not to require that he take any notice of any such proceeding. I believe that the people of the United States have their own fixed estimate of the Secretary of the Interior, and that they do not care to have him reply to any such scurrilous attack as was made upon him by Mr. Kearful, nor expect it of him.

During the last five years and a half, since the present Secretary of the Interior has occupied that position, during nearly all of which time I have had the honor of occupying the position of chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, I have had intimate official relations and much official business with the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, and I think I know quite well his character, as well as his attitude on public-land matters and his ideas on the policy of public-land legislation. I am glad to take this opportunity to say that I know him, in all that he does, to be actuated by the purest motives and a high sense of integrity and probity. I think it is highly reprehensible and most unjust for a man of the character of the present Secretary of the Interior to be attacked as he was before the House committee on that occasion, and in his absence, too. I think, however, that his standing is such that it is not only not necessary, but would be really improper, for him to take any notice of any such attacks from an inferior official.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] rather complains that the Secretary of the Interior did not take notice of the attack. I do not think anybody took much notice of it or took it seriously. Evidently the President of the United States does not think the attack sufficient to take any notice of or to dignify. Evidently he does not believe the charges made by Mr. Kearful on that occasion. If he did, the present occupant of the office of Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, would no longer be occupying that position. If the President of the United States thought there was any truth or merit in the statements made by Mr. Kearful, if Mr. Lane's resignation had not been forthcoming I am sure he would have been removed from the position which he occupies.

The Senator from Colorado, I find, made a remark to the effect that the present occupant of the office of Secretary of the Interior is merely Secretary of the Interior in name and not in fact. With all due respect to the distinguished Senator from Colorado, I think that was an incorrect, unwarranted, and unjust statement. I think Secretary Lane is in every way and absolutely Secretary of the Interior and is in full control of the affairs of his department of the Government in all respects, and that he has never hesitated to do whatever the duties of his position may have required or to take any stand that honesty and integrity and the best interests and welfare of the United States and the people thereof require. He has asserted every prerogative of his office and has not shirked or yielded an iota in discharging them. I think that his jurisdiction in that department has been undisputed and uninterfered with, except in one instance. That was in regard to the oil-land leasing bill, which is now in conference between the two branches of Congress. Over that bill it is true that there was a long dispute and controversy and much expression of different views in regard to its provisions by the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Navy.

I do not see, however, how that could have been prevented. I do not see how the Secretary of the Interior could have done anything to prevent it. I do not see that his prerogatives or his dignity were successfully encroached upon in any way whatever. That bill in its nature affected more or less three departments of the Government—the Interior Department, the Department of Justice, and the Navy Department. It was necessarily so.

It was principally within the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and yet it affected certain oil lands in the State of California which had been withdrawn from public entry by Executive order, and some of those lands were in litigation between the United States Government and the Southern Pacific Railway Co. Some litigation was in progress in the courts of the country over which the Attorney General had jurisdiction and which he and his assistants had been conducting on the part of the Government, and the Attorney General naturally felt that his Department had some interest in that legislation. The suits were pending. He seemed to feel that the proposed legislation might interfere with the pending suits, and he asked, as I understand, to have the privilege of appearing or having some of his assistants appear before the Senate and House committees which considered that legislation, or was invited to do so, I do not remember which. If he asked it, it was a very natural request, and there was no reason why the committee should refuse the request. There was no reason why the Department of Justice should not have representatives appear before those committees and state the attitude and contentions and views of the Department of Justice in regard to the litigation which was pending, and which the Attorney General felt that the legislation might interfere with. I do not see why the Department of Justice should have been expected to have kept silent on that proposed legislation while it was pending; and I do not see that the fact that representatives of that department asked the privilege of appearing, if they did, before committees of Congress which were considering the legislation necessarily encroached upon the Department of the Interior or its rights in the premises.

The Secretary of the Navy was naturally interested because he was endeavoring to provide an adequate supply of oil for the Navy, for the operation of warships, and he either asked or was invited to come before the committees of the House and the Senate and express the views of his department. So the three departments claimed, each of them, some interest in the proposed legislation, and claimed the right to express their respective views about the legislation—or, at least, did express them—and as long as representatives of the departments came before the committees and expressed their views and made their contention in a respectful manner, without reflecting upon the integrity of other departments or officials in other departments, I see no impropriety in it, and see no surrender by the Secretary of the Interior of any of his rights or prerogatives.

Mr. THOMAS entered the Chamber.

Mr. MYERS. I see the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has entered the Chamber. I said earlier in my remarks that I think the assault made upon Secretary Lane by Mr. Kearful before the House committee was wholly unwarranted and unjustified, and I said I thought the Secretary of the Interior was a man of such high standing and well-known integrity and probity that it was entirely proper for him to ignore that assault and pay no attention to it. I said, furthermore, that the President of the United States had evidently paid no attention to it, and I say now that I see no reason why we should pay any attention to it or bring it into the debates of this body. I said in that connection that I regretted that the intemperate language of Mr. Kearful had been dignified by being put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; that I thought it was improper to put it in the RECORD, and it would have been better if it had been left out.

I have never known any attempted interference with the prerogatives of the Secretary of the Interior or the jurisdiction of the Interior Department by other departments of the Government except in that one instance, if that may be regarded such, and I could not call that unwarranted interference, in so far as it consisted in a respectful expression of views by the heads of other departments or their representatives, a respectful and temperate statement of their interest in the legislation and of how it would affect their departments. They had a right to appear in a respectful way before the committees. I do not see that any official could properly be denied that privilege. I do not think, however, that the contentions of the various departments of the Government or the clashing of interests between them with regard to proposed legislation should influence Congress in the enactment of legislation, except in so far as paying due regard to all their arguments and contentions, putting them in the balance, and weighing them with due regard and then doing what Congress thinks is right, taking everything into consideration.

Congress should give all pertinent and respectful contentions and arguments due regard and then should enact such legislation as Congress in the last analysis thinks wise and proper and best.

The departments of the Government of the United States can not always be kept just as separate as parallel tracks of railroad running alongside of each other several feet apart. The business of our Government is so complex and complicated and so extensive and comprehensive that many things arise in which different departments of the Government have more or less interest or feel more or less interest. Many times different departments think they have a right to have something to say in regard to proposed legislation. You can not separate the different governmental departments with a razor edge just as you would cut a cake of cheese and keep them totally separate and apart. They are not like two streams of water running several miles apart, but which never converge.

They sometimes get into a common territory where there are matters and proposed legislation more or less affecting different departments of the Government. It is true that does not often arise to such an extent as arose over the oil-land leasing bill, in which three different departments of the Government set up conflicting views and to some extent clashing interests, but it does sometimes arise to more or less extent. I can imagine cases where it might arise even to quite as much an extent in other departments of the Government. Upon first thought, one could hardly think of anything arising in the Post Office Department in which any other department of the Government might feel any particular interest or claim any right to intervene and express contrary views to those of the Postmaster General; and yet, if we were maintaining a Government post office on a warship of the United States, I can see readily where the Postmaster General would naturally have the strongest interest in any legislation affecting it, while the Secretary of the Navy, when warships are carrying the mail, might feel that he had a right to have something to say about the proposed legislation, and the Department of Justice might intervene and express a view contrary to the views of one or the other of the other departments.

I can not see anything in the fact that three different departments of the Government have felt impelled to express views about oil-land leasing legislation and to try to have some influence in Congress over it as reflecting in any degree upon the capacity or disposition of the Secretary of the Interior to control the affairs of his own department. I think he has done so to the full extent which the law allows and to the extent which propriety would permit of his going. A Secretary of the Interior can not always have his way absolutely in everything where there is a converging of interests, where several different departments of the Government claim or have an interest in legislation and the right to have something to say about it, when all are subject to control by the President of the United States, the supreme authority in the end. Neither can any other Cabinet official.

I do not suppose there ever has been a Cabinet official who served a four-year term without coming to some extent in clash with the interests, wishes, or desires of some other department of the Government or with contrary views of the President of the United States. If a Cabinet official could serve four years and have his way absolutely in everything, conduct the affairs of his department in every respect just exactly as he thinks they ought to be conducted without regard to any other department of the Government and without regard to the views and wishes of the President of the United States, I think it would be a very remarkable thing. I doubt if it ever has occurred.

So I think the statement that the Secretary of the Interior is not Secretary of the Interior in fact as well as in name, or the imputation that he has surrendered any of his prerogatives or his official position or has yielded to any encroachment is wholly untenable and is not justified by the facts. I believe the present Secretary of the Interior has filled his position with as much assiduity, earnestness, and devotion to the duties of the office and with as much devotion to the welfare of the Western States, the public-land States of the Union, and the people of those States, as any man who has ever filled that office, at the same time having due regard for the welfare of the entire Nation. I believe he has devoted more care and attention and thought to the welfare of that portion of the Union which comes under the especial jurisdiction of his department probably than any other man who has ever filled that position. He has not shirked, yielded, or dissembled one jot or tittle in protecting those rights especially committed to his care and he has done it with fairness and impartiality. I believe it has been his sole aim and desire and his single thought, in filling that departmental position, to contribute particularly to the welfare of the western part of our country, the public-land States, and the people of those States, and the development of their resources, and in general to promote the welfare and common interests of the whole people of the United States, and to do justice to all.

The mere fact that in one piece of legislation, which is the only piece of legislation that I know of since the present occupant has been in office in which his views have been challenged or opposed by any other department of the Government; the mere fact that in one instance his views have been opposed by some other department of the Government, whether rightly or wrongly, I think is no ground for the imputation or conclusion that the Secretary of the Interior has lacked in zeal or fidelity in upholding the dignity of his department and advancing the interests of it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator in his statement that the Secretary of the Interior has with assiduity administered the duties of his high office. There is no encomium which he could bestow upon Secretary Lane that I would not most cordially concur in. I have often said that the present Secretary of the Interior was perhaps the best-equipped man in the United States for the performance of the duties of the office, and that his administration of this important department of the Government was not only brilliant but characterized by statesmanship and ability and conscientious devotion to duty of the highest order. Secretary Lane is a great man, doing a great work, and administering a great office. He has earned the confidence of the people, and his wise, liberal, and progressive policies have earned for him the gratitude of the American people. But I did not interrupt the Senator for the purpose of entering into the discussion, which, as I gathered from the remarks of the Senator, has resulted from some observations made by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a few days ago. I have been absent from the Chamber for a short time, and have not heard what the Senator has stated, except the last few sentences. Is not the Senator replying to the remarks of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. I am. That is the subject of my remarks.

Mr. KING. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Does not the Senator think that the Secretary of the Interior and the officials of the Land Department faithfully and honestly performed their duty in investigating the matters submitted to them under the law and which were involved in the applications for patents covering certain oil lands in the State of California?

Mr. MYERS. I am not prepared to pass upon the merits of the decision, because I am not familiar enough with the proceedings, but I am sure that he did his duty in investigating it and that he did it fairly and impartially, according to law, with fidelity and with a proper motive and to the best of his ability, and that those who assisted him in the conduct of the investigation did so to the best of their ability.

Mr. KING. With the information which I possess, I share the same views as those just expressed by the Senator. Indeed, I think that the importance of the questions presented and the publicity given to the applications for patents caused the officials of the Interior Department, including the Secretary of the Interior, to examine with the greatest possible care every question presented. From what I can learn, there was a determination that no fraudulent claim or one tainted with fraud or suspicion should be allowed, and each applicant for patent was compelled to prove, as he should always do, that he was clearly entitled to a patent from the United States. This tribunal, quasi judicial, investigated all questions, and pursuant to such it found the facts in favor of the applicants and solemnly adjudged that they were entitled to patents.

Does not the Senator think that the law authorizes the Interior Department to determine the question as to whether or not applicants for patents are entitled to have patents issued to them? And does not the Senator think that the courts upheld that view?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I do.

Mr. KING. Can there be any question under the authority both of the Federal courts and State courts as to the jurisdiction—let me add the exclusive jurisdiction—of the Interior Department to make such investigations and to determine whether the applicants are entitled to patents or not?

Mr. MYERS. None whatever.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that it must be conceded that the Interior Department did its duty in ascertaining the facts as to the character of the land, the validity of the locations, and whether the law had been complied with by those seeking patents. It acted pursuant to the law and within the law, and determined that certain persons were entitled to patents; but patents were not issued. Instead suits were instituted in the courts, men were forced into bankruptcy, all sorts of dilatory proceedings were resorted to by some one. The Interior Department's decisions were flouted and ignored. It was treated with contumely, if not contempt. It would seem that a wrong was done by some one. Now, whose duty was it to prevent this apparent, and as I believe real, injustice?

Mr. MYERS. I do not see that the Secretary of the Interior is in any wise to blame for the institution of those suits or how he could have prevented them. If attempts were made in the courts to annul the patents it was the duty of the courts to decide each proceeding upon the merits of the case and the law. It is the duty of the courts to decide an action at law. The Secretary of the Interior could neither decide the suits nor prevent them from being brought.

Mr. KING. I am expressing no opinion as to the power of the Secretary of the Interior to prevent the actions to which I have referred from being brought. These suits, however, resulted in a practical nullification of the action of the Interior Department; they have prevented patents from being issued to those entitled to the same and have forced men into bankruptcy and prevented the development of oil lands at a time when the Nation is crying aloud for oil to aid in its mighty war preparations and activities.

The Senator from Montana has just admitted that under the law it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior or his department to pass upon certain questions of fact to determine whether or not the applications for patents should have been granted and then to issue the patents. Why have not the patents been issued?

Mr. MYERS. Actions were brought, I understand, to annul the patents.

Mr. KING. Who had the authority to bring such actions? The Senator has conceded that the law is clear, and that the decisions of the courts, both the Federal and State courts, are to the effect that the action of the Interior Department is final; that it has exclusive jurisdiction. Then who authorized the long and destructive legislation which has followed?

Mr. MYERS. Anybody can bring a lawsuit.

Mr. KING. And force men into bankruptcy in the name of the United States?

Mr. MYERS. Nobody but the Government can bring a lawsuit in the name of the United States.

Mr. KING. These suits were brought in the name of the United States, and the power and authority of this great Government were employed.

Mr. MYERS. The Secretary of the Interior is nowise to blame for that. He is not responsible for it.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is right, and I want to acquit the Secretary of the Interior of what I conceive to be an injustice resulting from the institution of these suits. Now, who did it? Who was responsible for these actions?

Mr. MYERS. I judge the Department of Justice.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator justify the Department of Justice in bringing those suits?

Mr. MYERS. No; I am not justifying it at all.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think, when the law is so clear and the decisions of the courts are so uniform as to the modus operandi in securing patents, that after the Interior Department has judicially ascertained the facts and rendered its decision that some other department of the Government ought to ignore such decision and launch the power of the Nation against those whose vested interests have been recognized and adjudicated?

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not; but that does not at all reflect upon the Secretary of the Interior as permitting any encroachments upon his jurisdiction and the rights of his department. He could not prevent these suits from being brought. It was not in his power to prevent it, and if the suits were improperly brought it is for the court to decide that they were improperly brought, and render a decision to that effect. It is for the court to render a decision against the contentions of the Department of Justice.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that under the circumstances outlined in the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Secretary of the Interior, having himself passed upon the evidence in the particular instances, would have been justified, notwithstanding the action of the Department of Justice, in issuing patents under the orders he had previously made for them?

Mr. MYERS. I am not familiar with the status of the litigation at this time. I am not familiar with all of the proceedings of that litigation. There is a statute of the United States which confers upon courts the power to enjoin the Secretary of the Interior or any other official of the Interior Department from further proceeding with the issuance of a patent until it is passed upon by the courts and in some circumstances its issuance may be permanently enjoined.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding is that the greater part of the lands referred to by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Colorado were included in areas that were withdrawn from entry by the President of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I so understand.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The question of the Senator from Colorado would seem to imply that the Secretary of the Interior should proceed to issue patents for these lands—I am speaking now only of those lands in the areas that were withdrawn—notwithstanding the action of the President. A great many questions have been asked about who would interfere with the action of the Secretary of the Interior. It is very clear that the President can interfere with the action of the Secretary of the Interior, because he is the chief of the Secretary of the Interior as to all the duties of that office.

While I am speaking I should like to express some surprise—and let it go at just expressing surprise—at the objection of the Senator from Utah to any question of property rights or of justice or a proper administration of the law being submitted to the adjudication of the courts. I think, whether it is the United States or the humblest citizen of the land, one of the most essential guaranties of a proper administration of the Government is the opportunity to have these questions submitted to the courts. Whether or not the suit is improperly instituted, as has already been said by the Senator from Montana, whether or not the court had jurisdiction of the case, as well as the merits of the controversy itself, of course is to be determined by the courts, and any attempt on any state of facts in controversy between officials or the opinion of Senators that would deny to the United States or to any individual the opportunity and the privilege of having questions of that kind adjudicated by the judicial department of the Government would be an attack upon the very fundamental principles of our Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. May I say just a word in comment upon the remarks of the Senator from Washington? It is true that the locations which were cleared for patent by the Secretary of the Interior concerned lands within a naval reserve, but it is equally true that not even the President of the United States has the power to create a reserve and by that act destroy vested private interests within its boundaries. If the Secretary of the Interior in the discharge of his duties and in the discharge of duties committed to no one else after careful investigation determines that a patent shall issue, that has been regarded as conclusive of the case in all court decisions with which I am familiar. It is that situation which I had in mind in propoundng the query I just submtted to the consideration of the Senator who has the floor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to make an observation?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am somewhat surprised at the attitude assumed by the distinguished Senator from Washington. If his position were the correct one it would lead to all sorts of usurpations and tyrannies and oppressions. I am at a loss to comprehend how so able a Senator, particularly one who represents a great Western State and one who is so familiar with the public-land laws and the mining laws that have been enacted by the National Government, can uphold and defend a course of procedure and a general policy which would, in my opinion, deprive persons of their property, destroy vested interests, and justify and permit any agency or executive department of the Government to be made an instrumentality of oppression and tyranny.

It is not my purpose nor would it be proper in the time of the Senator from Montana to discuss the question as to the powers or jurisdiction of the Interior Department, but I wish to state that Congress, in the exercise of its undoubted authority, created the Interior Department and defined its duties and its authority. The Secretary of the Interior was charged with certain responsibilities with respect to the public lands. Under the law he supervises the public business relating to all public lands. The Government is a party, and an interested one, where the surveying and the disposal of the public lands are involved, and the Secretary of the Interior is the representative of the Government in all matters relating thereto. The Revised Statutes of the United States enact that all public-land laws shall be executed by the Interior Department. By law, clear and unambiguous, this department is specifically charged with the duty of enforcing the public-land laws. This duty does not pertain to the Navy Department nor to any other branch or department of the executive authority. It has been repeatedly held both by Federal as well as State courts that the Interior Department is a quasi judicial tribunal, and its jurisdiction in regard to the sale and disposal of the public domain is exclusive. There are some exceptions, perhaps, to this general statement, but these exceptions have been created by special acts; but the general rule is as I have stated; that is, that the Interior Department has functions which may be denominated judicial or quasi judicial, and that with respect to the exercise of these functions its jurisdiction is exclusive and its decisions are final. The Constitution declares that the Congress shall have the authority to make all needful rules and regulations with respect to the sale and disposal of the public lands of the United States. Pursuant to this power Congress, as I have stated, created a tribunal with full authority and in accordance with law to make disposition of the public lands of the United States. Some of the courts, as I recall, have denominated the Interior Department, together with the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the subordinate officers, a special tribunal, and this special tribunal unquestionably is vested with judicial power to hear and determine all questions which the law declares shall be submitted for its determination.

The Interior Department is authorized to issue patents to those applying therefor upon the ascertainment of certain facts. It possesses certain discretionary powers, and it is manifest that in the exercise of those powers no court would have the right to interfere, and it necessarily follows that within certain limits, as prescribed and defined by law, the decisions of the Interior Department are and must be final. As I remember the rule as announced by some of the courts, not only is its decision or judgment final with respect to questions of fact, which the law commits to its jurisdiction, but where there is a mixed question of law and of fact, or if the question is one of law alone, the decision of the department carries with it the presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review the decision. The Interior Department is charged with the duty, as I have stated, of ascertaining the character of the land for which patent is sought, and its determination thereon is final. It is charged also with the duty of ascertaining and determining whether the applicant has complied with the law so as to authorize the issuance of patent. And, as I recall, the courts have held that whenever the jurisdiction of this department has been invoked and it is making investigation to ascertain the character of the land for which patent is sought, and where its decision upon the question under the law would be conclusive, no court, State or Federal, has the authority to interfere.

My contention is that the Interior Department was charged with the duty of ascertaining whether the lands to which reference has been made were oil lands, and whether the applicants for patent were entitled to conveyances from the Government. Certain persons had entered upon lands in California, known to be oil lands, and had located them conformable to law. Their entries had been made at a time when the lands were subject to location; they were public, unoccupied mineral lands of the United States subject to entry by any person who, by law, was qualified to make a mineral entry. The lands had not been withdrawn by the Executive. After entry had been made, and while the locators were in possession, as I understand, an Executive order was promulgated, which sought to withdraw from entry these lands as well as others. When the locators applied for patent, the Interior Department made thorough investigation with a view to determining the character of the land, and whether the applicants were entitled to patent. As I have stated, the Interior Department was constituted a judicial tribunal to pass upon these questions. It represented the Government and protected the Government. At the same time it acted in a judicial capacity.

The applicants had vested rights, growing out of valid locations which they had made, and they established, to the satisfaction of this tribunal, all of the facts necessary to entitle them to patents from the United States. The Interior Department, having this exclusive jurisdiction to determine the questions involved, decided in favor of the applicants and "clear listed" the lands for which title was sought. This was a solemn adjudication by a tribunal of competent and, upon the questions which the law provided for submission to it, of exclusive jurisdiction. It decided that certain applicants for patents had complied with the law; that the land was mineral land and subject to location. In the light of the record in the case, as I understand it, those seeking patents were, as a matter of law, entitled to have the same issued to them. My information is that the Interior Department still adheres to that view and still insists that those whom it solemnly adjudged to be entitled to patents have the right to demand that the Government shall fulfill its obligation and abide by the decision of the tribunal which the Government erected to determine the questions involved in the decision rendered. Notwithstanding these solemn adjudications, the Navy Department and the Department of Justice, as I am advised, ignored the Interior Department and its adjudications and instituted various actions to deprive the applicants for patent of their property.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Just a moment. Congress committed the authority to the Interior Department to control and make disposition of the public lands. The officers of this department have taken an oath to enforce the laws, and they are clothed with authority to make the investigation, and then to determine whether the applicant for a patent is entitled to the same; and when they have so determined, when they have passed upon these preliminary questions committed by law to them, no department of the Government has a right to interfere. The President himself, notwithstanding my able friend has affirmed to the contrary, could no more rightfully interfere with the action of the Interior Department after it has passed or "clear listed" an application for patent than the distinguished Senator from Washington could interfere with the execution of a valid law. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know that the difference between the Senator from Utah and myself can be settled between us. We are parties to the controversy and consequently it would have to be left to some impartial third party to decide. It is almost like a plaintiff and a defendant in a lawsuit trying to decide the case. But the position is so plain that I think little elucidation of it is possible other than a mere statement of it.

The Senator from Utah states his position. It is that the President of the United States even can not stop the issuance of a patent of the public lands of the United States if the Secretary of the Interior wants to issue it.

I will let the statement go for what it shows upon its face as to the merits of that proposition. The patent has to be signed by the President of the United States before it is a valid patent, and to say that the Secretary of the Interior can command the President of the United States to issue a patent to public lands against the will of the President, it seems to me, is rather a far-fetched proposition, to use a mild term.

Furthermore, as to the general proposition which the Senator states, that the Secretary of the Interior has exclusive jurisdiction over these questions; it is true that in the clear listing of the entries for patent the Secretary of the Interior has jurisdiction, and that the courts will not interfere; but in questions of fraud and various other limitations and conditions, the courts will interfere; but as to when that line of demarcation is reached as to whether the Secretary of the Interior has paramount authority or whether the courts have jurisdiction, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to state under our Constitution and government who is to decide that question? Is the Secretary of the Interior the ultimate judge of his own authority or are the courts to decide it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana further yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Mr President, replying, first, to the first suggestion made by my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], I again express my surprise at the attitude which he has taken. I deduce from his observations that the President of the United States or any executive branch of the Government is not subject to the law; that the President of the United States may nullify the law, may set aside the action of any department of the Government, notwithstanding it is created by law and is proceeding strictly in accordance with the law.

Mr. President, the President of the United States has only such power in the disposition of public lands as is conferred upon him by law. He does not enact the law; he executes the law; the legislative branch of the Government determines how and in what manner the public lands may be disposed of. Congress has erected a tribunal, a quasi judicial body, to wit, the Interior Department, and it has committed to it the ascertainment of certain facts and the determination of certain questions, the same as Congress has committed to the various Federal courts the determination of certain questions. The President of the United States could no more interfere with the determination of questions submitted to the Interior Department than he could interfere with the decisions of the Supreme Court. It would be usurpation upon his part to set aside the law and to interfere with the due and orderly procedure by which title to public lands may be secured—procedure which has been prescribed by the Congress of the United States. Congress has the right to say that an applicant for patent shall proceed in a certain manner; Congress has the right to say that the Secretary of the Interior shall make certain investigations, and that those investigations shall be final, and that the applicant shall have patent after such investigations have been made and a decision thereon has been rendered. When the Secretary of the Interior, sitting as a court, passes upon those questions of fact and decides the questions submitted and committed to his charge by the Congress of the United States, his decision is a finality; and the President can no more interfere, I repeat, with his decision than he could interfere with a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior, as has been stated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], passed upon certain of these applications for patent; determined, after thorough and exhaustive hearings, that the applicants were entitled to patents. He did his duty; but his decisions are nullified, his authority overridden by other agencies of the executive branch of the Government.

The Senator from Washington asks whether or not it is a proper thing to submit controverted questions to the courts? Why, of course it is not only proper, but it is right to submit to the courts those questions which are properly the subject of judicial cognizance.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence, and then I will yield to the Senator.

When, however, Congress creates a tribunal and confers upon it exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine certain questions then, I submit, that it is improper for some other branch of the Government to employ the name and power of the Government to destroy the authorized and legal tribunal, and to harass and annoy and destroy those whose claims have been recognized and whose rights have been confirmed by a competent judicial body. Now I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask pardon of the Senator from Montana. I forgot that I was trespassing upon his time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the outcry of the Senator from Utah against lawlessness and anarchy seems to me to be somewhat misdirected. My opinion is that if his attitude should be the attitude of the Government, we shall be plunged immediately into a state of lawlessness. Whenever controverted questions of the administration of the law and the interpretation of the acts of Congress and of the ownership of property—which are the questions which are involved in these cases—can not be decided by the courts of the land, then we are in a state of anarchy, and that is what the Senator is contending for.

The Senator says, of course, if the laws of Congress are not complied with, those questions can come into court, and that only in those cases can the court have jurisdiction. Well, I should like to ask the Senator, Who is to decide whether or not the court has jurisdiction? The question of whether or not the laws of Congress have been complied with is the very question in these cases. Who is to decide this question? Is the Senator from Utah going to undertake to decide whether or not the Supreme Court has jurisdiction of these cases or is the Supreme Court of the United States going to decide its own jurisdiction? The Senator is a lawyer. Let him answer that question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I stated a few moments since that both the Federal and the State courts have uniformly held that the Interior Department had exclusive jurisdiction over certain questions; that the decision of the Interior Department on those questions is just as binding as is a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests, the Supreme Court of the United States has so held in numerous cases which have reached it.

The Supreme Court of the United States would have no more power to interfere with the Interior Department in the determination of questions exclusively committed to it than would the Interior Department have power to rightfully interfere with the action of that great tribunal upon matters which were referred to it by Congress for determination.

I again affirm that, in my opinion, the position of the Senator from Washington would inevitably lead to oppression and to a confusion which would be productive of anarchy.

His position, as I understand it, is that the action of Congress in organizing a department or body upon which it confers exclusive authority to hear and determine controverted questions and to ascertain whether certain facts exist can be disregarded, and that some other agency of the Government can seize the power and authority of the Nation and institute oppressive litigation in other forums, to deprive persons of their property rights recognized and affirmed by the tribunal established by law.

This is a government of law, not of men, not of departments. The executive department, from the President down, is governed by law, and departments must respect the law, just as the humblest citizen in the land is expected to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Montana pardon me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will say just a word. After all, it gets back to what we are debating here. The situation is this: Certain cases are pending in the courts which involve the title to some very rich oil lands in the West. Certain individuals and corporations are endeavoring to secure those lands. The President of the United States has withdrawn them from patent, and the Attorney General of the United States has instituted certain suits in the courts against the entrymen, charging fraud. The cases are going along in the usual way in the courts, the Attorney General of the United States, representing the public, representing the people of the United States. The courts decide their own jurisdiction. They will decide whether or not the laws of Congress are being carried out, whether or not there has been fraud, and whether or not the Secretary of the Interior has the right to issue these patents. That is the situation; that is the status of these lands and the status of this controversy. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] inveighs against the decision of those questions as to the title to the public lands of the United States by the courts of the land. That is the entire situation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have no desire to take any part in the side discussion that has been conducted by the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the equally eminent Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. It is rather beside the object to which I am devoting my remarks. However, I will say that, as the Senator from Utah has said, undoubtedly this is a Government of law, and it is for the courts to say what the law is. Furthermore, it is for the courts to decide whether or not actions at law and suits in equity are properly brought and may be maintained. It is not only the duty of the courts to decide the law, but to say what controversies may be litigated in the courts. It is for them to decide and establish their own jurisdiction. That is the theory of our Government. It is the theory upon which law is maintained in our Government.

The courts must be the last and highest resort in the decision of their own jurisdiction and as to what controversies may be litigated in the courts. Anybody can bring a lawsuit, but it is for the courts to say whether or not a lawsuit is properly brought; whether or not the court in which it is tried has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action and of the parties to the action. If the suits to which the Senator from Utah refers were improperly brought it is for the courts to say that they were improperly brought. The Secretary of the Interior has no authority to decide that they were improperly brought; he has no authority to decide the question of the jurisdiction of the courts and to throw these cases out of court on a demurrer which challenges the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter of the actions. The Secretary is in no wise to blame for these suits being brought. He could not prevent the suits from being brought, and he is not guilty of any dereliction of duty on account of the suits being brought. He has not abandoned any of the prerogatives or any of the dignity of his department of the Government because these suits have been brought; he must simply wait, as must every other citizen in the land, for the courts to decide these suits, and then abide by the action of the courts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KING. I made no criticism whatever of the Secretary of the Interior with regard to the institution of these suits or otherwise; on the contrary, I affirmed that, according to my information, he had faithfully performed his duty and had given a decision which was eminently fair and right. I know he is not responsible for these suits and that the purpose of the litigation is to overturn his decisions. But I arose only for the purpose of making an inquiry. The Senator states that it is the duty of the courts to decide certain questions. Does not the Senator concede that it is within the power of Congress to determine what Federal courts there shall be aside from the Supreme Court of the United States and to determine the jurisdiction of those courts?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, absolutely; but the courts must construe the power conferred upon them, and they must decide the question of jurisdiction—whether Congress did or did not confer the jurisdiction. If any court willfully decides the question wrongfully or abuses its power, the judge is subject to impeachment; Congress has its remedy, and it can remove any such judge.

Mr. KING. If Congress has the power to organize the courts, to determine the number of Federal courts, and to prescribe their jurisdiction, does not Congress have the power to determine what functions the Secretary of the Interior shall exercise and discharge, and may it not also confer upon the Secretary judicial or quasi judicial powers; and if so, is not his finding upon a question which the law authorizes him to determine just as binding upon the people and upon the Government as the decision of a court?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, undoubtedly; but if anybody challenges his right in the court you can not, under our form of Government, get away from a decision of that court to save your life. If Congress confers upon the Secretary of the Interior certain duties and certain jurisdiction, and he exercises those privileges, but somebody goes into court and undertakes to prevent him from exercising them or attempts to invade them or to take them away from him, the court must decide that question; the decision must be left to the court; you can not get away from that under our form of Government. The Secretary of the Interior can not decide such questions.

The Secretary of the Interior is in no wise to blame for the institution of these suits; he is not subject to any censure for dereliction or for neglect of his duties on account thereof. He can only abide by the action of the court the same as anybody else. There is a statute of the United States which gives to the courts of the land the right to review decisions of the officials of the Interior Department in land matters on certain grounds, one of which, I believe, is fraud.

Anybody can go into court and bring an action to review a decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon an application for patent. If the Senator from Utah enters a piece of public land, complies with the law in every way, makes his final proof, and patent is about to be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, I can go into the court and institute an action to enjoin the Secretary of the Interior from issuing that patent; but the Secretary of the Interior would not be to blame for that. The court must decide it. And if I bring the action on improper grounds the jurisdiction of the court should be challenged and the court should uphold the demurrer which challenges its jurisdiction. One can go into court for almost anything. I undertake to say that I could go into court to compel the President of the United States to sign a patent which he refuses to sign. Whether or not the court would uphold my application for a writ of mandamus would be for the court to say; but, no matter how it should decide the case, the President would not be to blame; nobody would be vested with power to render a decision except the court itself in which the action was brought. Merely because over this one piece of proposed legislation, the oil-land leasing bill, which has had a long, tempestuous, and tortuous career in the Congress of the United States, both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, because three different departments consider themselves more or less interested, and because there was this litigation properly or improperly pending in the courts in regard to some of the lands which the proposed legislation would affect—and only in this one instance, so far as I know, has there been anything done which might be characterized as an attempt at interference with the prerogatives, jurisdiction, and rights of the Interior Department—I can not see that there is any basis for the imputation that the Secretary of the Interior has abandoned any of his duties or has been culpable or derelict or subject to characterization as being Secretary of the Interior in name only, and not in fact.

I do not think the Secretary of the Interior has failed to do anything that he might have done or ought to have done. If other departments of the Government have gone into court and have undertaken to estop the discharge of the duties of his department of the Government or to interfere with his jurisdiction and divest him of rights and privileges, I do not see that it interferes in the slightest degree with the dignity and efficiency with which the Secretary of the Interior has administered the duties of his office.

It may be that these suits should not have been brought; but in that event the Secretary of the Interior is not the blamable party. If they have been brought, as I understand to be the case, by the Department of Justice, and if they have been improperly brought, the party to be blamed is the Attorney General. If any head of a department of the Government willfully and knowingly exceeds his powers, or undertakes to do so, or grossly abuses or prostitutes them, there is a remedy; Congress has a remedy, and the Senators whom I am addressing know as well as I do what that remedy is; and it is the only remedy. But I do not see, whether any other department is to blame or not, that the Secretary of the Interior is in the slightest degree to blame; on the contrary, I think he has upheld the honor, the dignity, the efficiency, the effectiveness, and the prerogatives of his department of the Government in a highly creditable and most satisfactory manner, and that he has devoted a degree of talent, ability, fidelity, and zeal to the discharge of his duties that has been unsurpassed by anyone else who has ever filled that office.

Since his incumbency of that office the public-land laws have been administered, I believe, in a more efficient, satisfactory, and expeditious manner than they have ever heretofore been administered. I know in the State of Montana that homesteaders and other public-land entrymen have had their affairs attended to in a manner which, in the main, is highly satisfactory, which has been generally fairly expeditious, and as a rule without any useless red tape or technicalities in the administration of the law, and I believe that the public-land affairs of the State of Montana and of all the Western States are now in a better condition and for some years have been better administered than for many years previous. I know that under the administration of Secretary Lane the State of Montana has had made within its borders about one-third of all the public-land entries of the United States each year for a number of years past, and I have had very little complaint about the administration of the public-land laws. I have had but very little complaint of delay in administration; and of the thousands and thousands of homesteaders and other public-land entrymen who within the last seven or eight years have come into Montana, constituting a perfect stream of immigration and new homemakers in that State, I have had comparatively few complaints of injustice or delay or complaints upon any other ground about the administration of the public-land laws. I believe that Montana is only typical of the other Western States in that respect. On the other hand, I have had many expressions of satisfaction with the manner in which the affairs of homesteaders and other entrymen have been attended to by the Department of the Interior in the last few years.

Of course, there have been some complaints of delay, and doubtless in some cases there has been more delay than there ought to have been, but I think that is largely, if not wholly, due to the fact that the General Land Office is handicapped by a shortage of help. I have tried for years to secure the adoption of amendments to appropriation bills to allow greater appropriations for the employment of agents, clerks, inspectors, and other employees in the General Land Office than it has had. I have not been successful because Congress is generally very reluctant about making appropriations to increase the clerical help in the departments, except in those departments which are engaged in work intimately connected with the prosecution of the war, such as the War Department and the Navy Department; but I think the General Land Office ought to have had more help than it has had, and I think that most of the delay of which complaint has been made is due to the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has not had as much help as he ought to have had and as the work required. I admit that the work is not always as well up as it might be, but I put it wholly on the ground of lack of help. I think all the affairs of the Interior Department have been conducted in the best possible manner with the help which has been allowed it by law.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I care to say upon the subject. I regret that I was not here to have heard the remarks about the Secretary of the Interior day before yesterday, in order that I might have undertaken, in my humble way, to make some impromptu response at that time, but I was not here; I did not hear the remarks and did not know of them until I came into the Chamber this afternoon, and then not until my attention was called to them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday. I had no opportunity to make any remarks in reply yesterday, because the Senate was not in session, and this is the first opportunity that I have had to do so.

I take this, the first, opportunity to say that I think that the honorable Secretary of the Interior was by some of the remarks on Thursday put in a decidedly unjust light, and one which he does not deserve; and I could not let the opportunity go without challenging some of those remarks or at least expressing my views, which are at variance with them, and giving expression to my full and complete confidence in the Secretary of the Interior and in the manner in which he has administered the affairs of his office in all particulars.

The sum and substance of my views is that I think the attack of Mr. Kearful before the House Committee on the Public Lands was grossly wrong, wholly unjustified and indefensible, and that the Secretary of the Interior was entirely justified in ignoring it as being beneath his dignity. I think it was unnecessary for a man of his high standing, character, integrity, and well-known probity to take any notice of such an attack. I am sorry that that attack of Mr. Kearful was dignified by being put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think it would have been better if it had been left out. No good purpose was served by giving it that notice no one else has given it, by bringing it into the debates of this body and dignifying it with publicity; and I think an unintentional injustice was thereby done to a good man and official.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall detain this large and inspiring audience of Senators but a very few minutes. If it were not for the fact that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has either misapprehended my purpose and my statements on day before yesterday or that I have been unfortunate in expressing the views that I had in mind, I should not detain this body a moment longer.

I have made no attack on the Secretary of the Interior. I would not do so if I could. I could not do so if I would.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just a minute please. I do not claim that the distinguished Senator has made any attack upon the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. The gist of my remarks was that the distinguished Senator from Colorado said in his remarks on Thursday, as I read in the RECORD, that the Secretary of the Interior was Secretary of the Interior in name only and not in fact. That, I thought, was unjustifiable, and it was that to which I directed my remarks.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President; I said that. I was discussing the attempted land legislation of this Congress, and consequently I had that branch of the Secretary's jurisdiction in view when I made that statement.

It is not necessary for me to assure the Secretary of the Interior of my personal friendship. Indeed, I have been greatly concerned, owing to my sincere regard for him, both as a man and as an officer, because of conditions which seemed to me to interfere with and to prevent his free exercise of his judgment and his discretion in the administration of the land affairs of the Government. I knew of the attack made upon the Interior Department by Mr. Kearful on the 28th day of February shortly after it occurred. I fully expected that notice would be taken of it and that the statement would either be withdrawn or that some consequences might follow, as I think they should have followed. I waited through the months of March, April, May, June, July, and August for some one to take notice of what I characterized then and still declare to be a most unheard-of and unprecedented attack by one department upon the integrity of another before a committee in a public, official hearing. The opportunity for me to direct public attention to it did not occur until the attempt to refer the so-called water-power bill to a conference committee; and that, if my recollection serves me right, is ostensibly the subject matter of our present discussion.

I felt it my duty not only to resist the adoption of that motion, but also to amend the bill by grafting upon it the measure which the Senate passed last February providing for the lease of oil and other nonmetallic mineral lands of the United States, and to give a very brief history of the events punctuating the career of that bill from the time it left the Senate and went to the House until now.

Mr. President, I quite agree that Mr. Kearful, individually considered, is a wholly inconsequential person in this discussion. I am not concerned about his personality or his achievements. They are entirely beside the position which he occupied at the time he made the statements which I read into the RECORD. The Senator says he sees no impropriety in the appearance before congressional committees on land matters of the Attorney General and of the Secretary of the Navy. Neither do I. I have not complained of that. If they can be of service to committees in the consideration of legislation, I am sure the latter will welcome their presence. The Attorney General of the United States is the legal officer of the administration, and in the exercise of his duties he is presumed to pass upon and determine the correctness of legal phraseology and the effect of bills which have been enacted into law that the President may determine whether or not he should exercise his power of veto. The appearance of the Attorney General before the Land Committees of the Senate and the House may frequently enable them to legislate more intelligently, not only with regard to the subject matter before them but also with regard to the terminology used to express the legislative will. That is all right. My criticism goes to what took place before the House committee when that department, represented by an assistant, impugned the integrity of the Interior Department.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just a minute, please. I concur very heartily in that criticism.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the Senator concurs in it, but thinks that it should not have been dignified by any notice in the Senate. There is where we differ.

Mr. MYERS. Or elsewhere.

Mr. THOMAS. Or elsewhere. There is where we differ, toto cælo. We must assume that Mr. Kearful was speaking for the Attorney General of the United States and not for himself.

Mr. MYERS. I think that is a very violent assumption, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, from time immemorial the good old Anglo-Saxon maxim has been in force that what one may do by himself he may do by another. This man was the representative of that department. He is the assisstant having charge of all land matters in that department. He was the alter ego on this occasion of the head of the department. Hence, in view of the fact that what he said has not been repudiated by the honorable the Attorney General, so far as I know, we are bound to conclude that he voiced the sentiments of that department, and, as a consequence, we must conclude that in the opinion of the Attorney General's Department the Interior Department, in the administration of this bill, if it becomes a law, instead of punishing fraudulent locators would reward them by granting them leases as they might desire.

Mr. President, I resented that as an imputation upon the integrity of one of the greatest Secretaries of the Interior we have ever had, and, in my judgment, the only reason which can justify the silence of the Department of Justice concerning Mr. Kearful's statement is either that it is approved or that the head of the department never heard of it; and of course the latter inference, to my mind, is a very violent one.

My own judgment is—I can only speak from a personal standpoint—that the matter should have been fought out and settled then and there between the two departments. Mr. Finney, representing the Interior Department, justly indignant over this imputation, arose and protested against it. That was not only natural and proper, it was most commendable; and there the incident seems to have ended. Had I been Secretary of the Interior—which I was not and never expect to be—I would have called attention to that and had it corrected or I would have tendered my resignation to the President of the United States. Evidently what I would have done differs very materially from what the honorable Secretary thought he should have done. I have no doubt that he did what he thought was best under all the circumstances; and, of course, he is the person to determine that question.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should just like to say that if the Secretary of the Interior had taken the latter alternative over a small, petty difference of opinion on the part of a subordinate official, I think it would have been a calamity to the Western States of this country and to the people of the entire country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this incident may be a small one in the opinion of the Senator. Here, again, we differ. I do not regard a criticism of that sort, emanating from one department against another, as a small thing. I think it is a most extraordinarily important circumstance.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will excuse me, I meant to criticize the spirit which brought forth the expression of Mr. Kearful as a petty one.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I do not care what brought it forth. I am not concerned with whether it was a spirit of pettiness on the part of the official or not. I am concerned about a charge spread upon a public record months ago and affecting the integrity of the Interior Department. Perhaps I am overly concerned. The fact that those directly involved in the circumstance have not seen fit to resent it justifies that belief. It depends upon the point of view.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I simply wish to say that if a United States Senator should resign every time he is charged by some constituent with an improper motive in something that he does there would soon be nobody in the United States Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. That might be a great blessing to the country.

Mr. MYERS. It would soon be an empty body.

Mr. THOMAS. That would not be an unmixed evil, Mr. President. But if the President of the United States, speaking through one of his petty officers, should declare that the Senator from Montana was not an honest man, and the Senator saw fit to ignore it, I certainly would not; the Senate of the United States certainly would not; and if the Senator submitted quietly to such a statement from such a source, and objected to his colleagues taking it up, then, with all due respect to him, he ought to resign.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the Senator must not understand me as doing anything more than using him as an illustration.

Mr. MYERS. I certainly would not resign. That would be one thing I would not do.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, they say Democrats never do. [Laughter.] I know the Senator would not resign. I know what he would do. He would vindicate himself, as he could very easily do, and he would not wait five or six months to do it. So I think that the illustration which the Senator interrupts me for the purpose of stating is not at all apropos.

Mr. President, I have taken up more time than I intended. There is, however, another phase of the subject which has intruded itself into the discussion to which I will briefly refer before taking my seat.

I am not wholly in accord either with my friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], or with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], regarding the powers of the Secretary of the Interior over land affairs. I think both are partly right. The action of the Interior Department or of the Secretary of the Interior in adjudicating upon applications for patents is final. The right of the Government to institute suit, even after patent is issued, to set the patent aside upon the ground of fraud not brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior is undoubted.

The right to bring an action in the name of the United States, after patent, to cancel patent for grounds recognized by the courts, unquestionably exists; but the decisions of the department can not be assailed collaterally. I believe that the President of the United States has the power, the Secretary of the Interior having acted according to his best judgment, to overrule him, because he occupies the ultimate position of responsibility, and the Secretary of the Interior is accountable to him and to no one else. All this, however, is but an incident to the general situation; and about that I have said all that I care to say.

I know that a number outside of this body have construed my remarks of day before yesterday as an attack upon the Secretary of the Interior; and it is because of that circumstance that I have taken advantage of this opportunity to make that subject clear, so that hereafter there can be no misunderstanding about it. There is no more upright, honest, capable, conscientious official in the Government to-day than Franklin K. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior. I did not charge him—I can not charge him—with abandoning the duties of his office. He has not done so. What I said was that other heads of departments had invaded some of his prerogatives, and he had not protested. What I said was that interferences which I do not believe are justifiable have occurred with his management of land affairs, to the injury of the public and of many individuals acquiring rights on the public domain through strict compliance with the requirements of the Federal statutes. I am prepared, on any occasion that may be apposite, to prove these assertions by specific instances, if necessary. I am not making the statement through misinformation, unless the sources of my information are themselves unreliable; and I think it is as necessary to preserve in all their integrity the several jurisdictions of the various departments, if we are to have peaceful and successful administrations, as it is for the legislative and the executive authorities each to observe, as far as it is possible for them to do so, the respective limitations placed upon their power, and to intrude as little as possible upon the boundaries of the other departments.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes only on this subject.

I was not able to be in the Senate on Thursday. I was here for a time in the morning, and was called out by some matters which required my attention before the Treasury Department and the War Department. I always listen to what the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] says, first because I regard him as one of the ablest men not only in the Senate but in the Nation as well. He is usually careful and judicious in his expressions, and it may appear to be a piece of presumption for me even to refer in a critical sense to what he may say upon any subject; but upon this occasion he and I are so much at variance, and the matter is so vital, that I ought at least to express my view of the situation presented.

No person can determine for another the course of conduct in life. We must each and all mark out such conduct for ourselves. No other person can give to the Senator from Colorado a philosophy of life. That must be adopted and acted upon by each one for himself and by himself. The rule of conduct that guides and controls men in their struggles and in their contests must be one that appeals to their judgment and their own consciences. It so happens in this case that the rule of conduct which the distinguished Senator from Colorado asserts that he would follow is not one which I would always follow.

For example, it appears that a gentleman by the name of Kearful——

Mr. KING. Not "Careful."

Mr. ASHURST. Not "Careful"—Kearful—before a committee of the House, some time last February, made some observations in the course of his argument which some members of the committee and the Senator from Colorado construe to be a reflection upon the Department of the Interior, and the Senator from Colorado last Thursday complained extremely that the Secretary of the Interior had not resented the statement made by Kearful. The Senator from Colorado is usually so accurate in his view of public matters and his philosophy of life that it is astonishing that he could have wandered so far from what, in my judgment, is the true rule, usually, for a public official. The Senator from Colorado is disturbed because the Secretary of the Interior has not wasted valuable time on this man Kearful.

If the Secretary of the Interior were to pause in the performance of his vast duties to answer the ill-founded assertions of disappointed litigants and to answer the criticisms of those who attempt illegally to acquire the public domain and are thwarted, he never would have time for public business.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly I yield; yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with the Senator. Does the Senator think that the charge which I criticized was made by an irresponsible citizen or a disappointed litigant?

Mr. ASHURST. Why, I never heard of the man's name until to-day. Now, Mr. Kearful may be one of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States, but I do not happen to have the honor of his acquaintance. If I ever met him, I have forgotten it.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator distinguish between Mr. Kearful and the Assistant Attorney General of the United States, speaking for that department?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not believe that Mr. Kearful, or Tearful, or whatever his name may be, speaks now, or spoke then, in a true sense for the Department of Justice.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, that is the difference between us. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I realize, however, that when a man speaks in his official capacity as Assistant Attorney General he is "presumed" to speak for the Department of Justice; but I do not believe that the views which Mr. Kearful expressed before the committee with such facility, and without any facts whatever to maintain his assertion, are the views of the Department of Justice; and I did not read this statement until this morning. I never knew about it until another Senator called my attention to it, and then I read it. It is one of those bald statements without the slightest scintilla of evidence to support it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the Senator knows that this gentleman is still the Assistant Attorney General and has been ever since he made that statement.

Mr. ASHURST. This is the first time I have learned of that. I did not know enough about him to know that he was then Assistant Attorney General or to know that he still retains the position.

Mr. MYERS. May I make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I will state to the Senator from Arizona that Mr. Kearful merely expressed his opinion as to what the Secretary of the Interior would do under certain circumstances in the future, and I dare say that a contrary opinion is held by 99,999,990 people in the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for the interruption. I want it, however, to be understood that I am not making any assault upon Mr. Kearful, because I do not know that gentleman. It would be folly for me to stand here and make an assault upon him when I know nothing about him. I am only judging from what is alleged to be his statement and judging him upon his alleged statement. I do not blame the Secretary of the Interior for not making reply thereto, because the things that Mr. Kearful stated are hazy, nebulous, uncertain, and hypothetical; that if the Secretary of the Interior were to abandon his duties and rush in to make a "resentful" defense against nebulous, weak, inconclusive, omnium gatherum statements of that kind he would be kept busy at something outside his duties. I did not rise, however, to discuss Mr. Kearful. He may be a very estimable gentleman. I know nothing about him. I rose to express my regret that matters of this kind are creeping into the RECORD. I am liberal rather in regard to matters going into the RECORD. I am not, I think, thin-skinned about what goes into the RECORD as against those who can reply, but it seems far-fetched for a distinguished Senator whose influence in this country is great and whose words are listened to as the Senator from Colorado is listened to, to rise and make serious and lamentable complaint because the Secretary of the Interior did not resent what somebody else said about him [the Secretary].

Mr. President, I am sorry to confess that I am not free from resentfulness. I resent insults as quickly as anyone, but if I paused in these great times to resent what is said about me I would never have time to do my duty as a Senator nor to answer a roll call in this Chamber; I would be quite busy answering things that arouse my resentment.

In regard to the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, he needs no defense at my hands. He certainly needs no defense at the hands of anybody on the ground that he ought to have been "resentful." When the historian comes to estimate the character of Secretary Lane the venom and the malice of the enemies he has made in his stalwart defense of public right and public honesty will not weigh more than as idle wind which to-day passes him by, and which he regards not.

I commend him rather for refusing to embroil his great office in the miserable debauchery of a quarrel as to which particular department shall have jurisdiction over this matter that has aroused all this debate. I agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who has just spoken on this subject. I think frequently the jurisdiction of the departments is so interlaced and intertwined that it is very difficult to ascertain just what department should have jurisdiction. Frequently there is a divided responsibility and a divided jurisdiction, and to criticize the Secretary of the Interior because he did not set himself up as an autocrat and say, "I will not allow another department of the Government to permit its views or suggestions to interfere with my views and suggestions," would be unreasonable, indeed.

I have read some history touching our public men. I know of no man who is more respected by the two great political parties contending for supremacy now than is Secretary Lane. He has the confidence of all right-thinking people, and their confidence is reposed in him justly, in my opinion, not only because of his stalwart integrity, but because of his remarkably accurate and wide comprehension of the problems confronting our country now, and that will arise and confront our country when we are no longer here to aid it in this great struggle to give liberty and good government to the people.

There is but one man in this country and only one, and he is Woodrow Wilson, who has a greater conception of the grandeur and the duties and the obligations of public men than has Secretary Lane. No man in my day, except Woodrow Wilson, has horoscoped the future as accurately as has Secretary Lane. I presume every Senator received a copy of the letter Secretary Lane wrote to Members of Congress but two or three months ago, pointing out the necessity of taking care of returned soldiers on farms, and the problem of redeeming stump and cut-over land, reclaiming swamp land, for I think that letter was put into the RECORD half a dozen times. I wonder if Mr. Kearful, and I mention his name with respect, because I have no right to do otherwise, could write such a letter as that.

I think we must be more careful of the way in which we handle the names of people. Human character is a tender subject. There are people in this country who when they read a charge against a man, made possibly by some irresponsible individual, attach importance to it. I am not assuming the attitude of a censor or attempting to rebuke anybody, but I simply say that I do not agree with my distinguished and loved friend, the Senator from Colorado, who asserts that the Secretary of the Interior ought to abandon the attention that he is placing upon his duties and rush forward with a resentful defense and denial of the insinuation made by Mr. Kearful.

The Senator says that under such circumstances if the charges are not withdrawn there should be a resignation on the part of the Secretary. I do not know that I can quote him accurately, but that is the effect of his statement.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not say that. I stated what I would have done under similar circumstances.

Mr. ASHURST. I am going to say that I am not trying to flatter the Senator from Colorado. He would object to and resent improper and unjust praise of himself as quickly as he would resent an improper and unjust criticism of himself. There are few men I have ever met who have as much courage as the Senator from Colorado. He frequently votes alone. It takes no courage sometimes to vote alone when you are right, but he has the courage frequently to vote alone when he is wrong. He is a man of experience, but I can not see upon what philosophy he could predicate an opinion that a man ought to resign from a Cabinet position because another head of a department did not discharge some inferior member of that department who made some statement reflecting on the other Cabinet official. Mr. Lincoln would not have had a Cabinet at all; he could not have maintained a Cabinet under such a proceeding. Seward nearly all the time declined to speak to or fraternize with Stanton. Seward did not resign and Stanton did not resign simply because they did not "like" each other.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is a student of history. Can he name an instance in the administration of Mr. Lincoln where one member of a Cabinet or his assistant publicly announced that another Cabinet member or his department was not capable of honestly administering his trust?

Mr. ASHURST. I can.

Mr. THOMAS. Where?

Mr. ASHURST. When Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, let the contract for the construction of the Monitor, which destroyed the Merrimac, the Secretary of War practically charged him with malfeasance of public funds for letting that contract; but when the Monitor sank the Merrimac that same Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, charged Gideon Welles, the Secretary of the Navy, with inefficiency because he did not let a contract for more than one Monitor. But there was no resignation.

Mr. THOMAS. Then will the Senator inform the Senate, if the charge was made, if it was made publicly, which I think the Senator is mistaken in asserting, and whether any investigation was demanded or any challenge of the truth of the statement was made?

Mr. ASHURST. In the first place, I do not know that it was made publicly in the newspapers.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that it was not made publicly at all.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator may be right, but at least the President knew of the charge and all the Cabinet members knew of the charge.

Mr. THOMAS. It was a family matter, so to speak.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; an official family matter.

Mr. THOMAS. It was made privately; that is to say, in the Cabinet. The record of it was found in Mr. Welles's diary.

Mr. ASHURST. But there are other evidences of it. At another time a very severe criticism was made with reference to building some sort of an obstruction in the Potomac River to prevent the Confederate fleet from coming up and destroying the city of Washington. The Secretary of War caused a number of boats to be sunk some miles below this city, and for years afterwards those boats were referred to as Stanton's navy. It led to a very serious disruption of friendships. It led to a criticism that arose between members of that Cabinet, between Secretary Stanton and Secretary Welles. Nobody suggested that one of those two should resign.

Now, that is about all I have to say, Mr. President. I certainly wish to say nothing in a controversial spirit. I hope that in the future all Secretaries of the Interior will be as assiduous and as diligent and have a scope of vision such as is possessed by the present Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps about half an hour ago the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] asked, in the event of no one desiring to speak further, that I should move a recess until 4.30. The reason for that request is that the chairman of the Finance Committee is expecting to present a conference report.

Mr. THOMAS. In moving adjournment I am carrying out the request of the Senator from Virginia, as I understood it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the conferees can not report this afternoon. Members of the conference told the Senator from Virginia to let the Senate adjourn, as it was impossible for the conferees to report this afternoon.

Mr. THOMAS. That was my information.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not so advised.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Virginia conferred with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and they came to an agreement that the Senate should not be held in session to receive the report to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 23, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 21, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. CRISP, Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we approach Thee with renewed faith and confidence that Thou wilt continue Thy favors unto us.

Quicken therefore our conscience and clarify our minds, that we may act nobly and intelligently our part in the great drama of life and so fulfill the law and the prophets.

Our hearts go out in deepest sympathy to the Member of this House, and his stricken wife in their profound sorrow and grief. Comfort them, we beseech Thee, by the blessed promises of the Gospel and help them to look forward with faith to that day when all tears shall be wiped from all faces and all hearts lost in eternal joy. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

CONFUSION OF IDENTITY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There seems to be a disposition on the part of the Official Reporters, as well as others, to confuse the identity of the gentleman from Ohio, Judge GARD, and myself. I am flattered, complimented, and pleased by it, but Judge GARD, naturally, I imagine, would have a kick coming. I do not know how often in the RECORD in the six years we both have been in Congress it has appeared where words were attributed to Judge GARD that I have uttered, but I know it has happened at least four or five times. Perhaps Judge GARD would object to that. I do not know whether words which he has said have been attributed to me at times, but, anyhow, I hope hereafter that the reporters will recognize the difference between the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and myself.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Might the gentleman not state to the reporters what the difference is between himself and the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The gentleman now speaking is the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. DOOLITTLE.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, be given 30 minutes in which to address the House. He was going to make the request himself but was called away suddenly by a telegram.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that immediately after reading the Journal on Monday and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, may have 30 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. Would not the gentleman from North Carolina include 30 minutes for the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, and the close of Mr. NEELY's address?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina adds to that a request that the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, at the expiration of the address of the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, may also have 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question for information. I was not here yesterday at the moment when the House adjourned. Was there an agreement to take up the agricultural stimulation bill on Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from North Carolina knows that I am very anxious to get up the emergency power bill next Monday, and if these unanimous consents get in the way I do not know how I am going to get consideration of that bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest to the gentleman that he get unanimous consent to take his bill up immediately after these gentlemen have addressed the House.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman's bill would not be in order on Monday.

Mr. SIMS. I want to get unanimous consent to take it up, and such consent will make it in order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let the gentleman from Tennessee ask unanimous consent that his bill be taken up immediately following the addresses of these two gentlemen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understood that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] stated last evening, in response to a query propounded to him by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], that immediately on the day following the taking up of the Agricultural appropriation bill it was his intention to bring up the food-conservation bill. I want to inquire of the gentleman whether it is his purpose to bring up the food-conservation bill on Monday?

Mr. LEVER. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I desire to say that I feel somewhat embarrassed. This morning I learned that a great many gentlemen from New England—particularly from the States of Massachusetts and New Jersey—have primaries on Tuesday next. Many of them have reservations already to leave to-night. I do not think I said that I intended not to call the food-stimulation bill up to-day, but my friend from Wisconsin calls attention to the fact that I told gentlemen privately that I would not.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say that Mr. MORIN, from Pennsylvania, has gone home.

Mr. LEVER. Of course I can not call the bill up to-day under such circumstances. I would like very much if we can agree to some program that would take care of my friends from New England, but I do not see very well how we can agree to hold the bill in abeyance until the last of next week; and they could not reach here until the last of next week. So, if we can arrange to do it, I would like to call the bill up on Monday and send it to conference. The parliamentary situation is this: The Committee on Agriculture has recommended that the House disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for, except the war-time prohibition amendment, and there it recommends that the House agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment which allows the importation of wine until May 1, 1919. We agreed to that amendment at the urgent request of the State Department for certain foreign countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is not much question in the mind of the gentleman from South Carolina and in the mind of any Member of the House as to what the action of the House is going to be in sending the bill to conference and agreeing to the prohibition amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I think everyone realizes that the war-time prohibition amendment will be overwhelmingly carried in the House, and of course I take it that the other disputed points will be sent to conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why can not the whole bill go to conference?

Mr. BUTLER. No; let us vote on the prohibition amendment and get rid of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it to be understood that we take up the food-conservation bill on Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under these circumstances, as we have general debate to-day, I do not see any reason why we should indulge in debate on Monday; therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. Under a special order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is entitled to 30 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the emergency power bill (H. R. 12776) be taken up for consideration, following the action of the House on the bill just referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], next Monday.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Let the Chair state the request. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the emergency power bill be made the special order, to be taken up for consideration on Monday next, immediately on disposing of the agricultural food-stimulation bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman what became of the emergency power bill that has already been passed?

Mr. SIMS. We have not passed any emergency power bill. We passed a 50-year leasing water-power bill.

Mr. SNELL. Was that not an emergency proposition?

Mr. SIMS. No; and never was so considered.

Mr. SNELL. I understood when it was presented to this House that it was an emergency proposition.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman misunderstood the character of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, the gentleman has the power and right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The Chair just stated the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that the consideration of the emergency power bill, so called, be made in order to follow after the emergency food bill was disposed of. I do not understand that there is any agreement that the food bill shall be taken up—only a statement by the gentleman from South Carolina that he would propose to take it up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Answering the inquiry, the Chair submitted the request just as the gentleman from Tennessee submitted it to the Chair, but the Chair will further state that the agricultural food-extension bill is a privileged bill in its present status, and the Chair presumed that the gentleman from South Carolina would call it up.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, for the information of the House, in order that I may not have to answer the question three or four hundred times to-day, that we will call up the agricultural stimulation bill on Monday.

Mr. TREADWAY. At the opening of the session?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

POLITICS AND THE WAR.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, most of the Members of this House of both parties are candidates for reelection, and as the time approaches it is idle for us to pretend that we are not deeply interested in the result. Each of us believes that the success of his party will be beneficial to the Nation and will promote its prestige and success on both sides of the Atlantic. I do you on that side of the House the credit to believe that if you thought it would save one soldier's life or shorten by one day the war to have the next House Republican, you would acquiesce in that result, and I claim for this side equal patriotism. But each of us believes unreservedly in his own side.

One fact we will all admit, that there has never within our memory been a time when party feeling manifested itself so little as within the past 18 months, or when both sides of the House worked together with such harmony and cooperation to strengthen the hands of an administration. During no previous war has there ever been such unanimity or such a suppression of criticism. And I think it is not unfair for me to suggest that at least one-half the credit for that rests with the Republicans. We have been the minority. Under our system of government one of the main functions of the minority is to criticize and attack. It has no opportunity of initiative, no share of the patronage, no connection with the administration. For you Democrats it is natural and advantageous to support the administration, which in turn assists you. For us it is unnatural and brings no advantage. So for us to uphold an administration whose election we strenuously opposed and which has never consulted or befriended us has been, I think, more difficult than for you. But you on that side of the House have done your best to make it easy for us. You have met our advances with a consideration and a good will which has made cooperation pleasant, and I wish to express my warm appreciation of the genial spirit which has characterized our relations during this Congress. [Applause.] Perhaps I ought to add in contrast that for more than a year I have been the acting leader of the minority, and if during that time there has been by the administration any consultation or any recognition in any way of the Republicans in this House it has escaped my memory. [Laughter.]

During most of this Congress there has been an entire absence of partisanship in the speeches, but as the election approached in which we were all so deeply interested it was, I presume, inevitable that what we were thinking should find expression. The chairman of the Democratic congressional committee was, I think, the first one to stain the columns of the RECORD with the partisan tinge from which they had so long been free. He obviously intended his last speech as a campaign document, to be transmitted through the mails in the pending congressional campaign, just as there have been sent out under his frank and without paying postage, thousands of a partisan editorial from a New York newspaper which he slipped into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In this campaign speech the gentleman cites figures to show that the two Democratic Congresses during the first term of President Wilson appropriated more money for the Army and Navy than did the Republican Congresses during the terms of either President Roosevelt or President Taft, arguing that those Democratic Congresses were more liberal and more foresighted in preparing our Army and Navy for war than were the Republican Congresses. It is quite a new note to be sounded by a Democratic Congressman. It shows what a change the war has effected. It shows how a party can become ashamed of its past policy. It shows that some in the Democratic Party recognize public opinion too well to dare to say with Mr. Creel that they thank God we were not prepared when the war broke out. It shows a wish to make the people think that the Democratic Party had done more than the Republican Party to prepare us for war. And letters are being systematically sent out by the same Democratic chairman, pressing the same argument and trying to monopolize as a Democratic asset the patriotic war spirit which now inspires the Nation.

But the people have not such short memories as to be deceived by this superficial argument. The Democratic Congresses cited did spend more for war purposes than the Republican Congresses—but why? Was it because they had greater foresight and wisdom? During the first of those Congresses we had the War with Mexico, which compelled large military expense. The second of those Congresses did not meet until seven months after the sinking of the Lusitania and did not end until after Germany had made war upon us and our diplomatic relations with her were broken off, and only a month before we declared war. Did appropriations made under those circumstances indicate much foresight? The great naval appropriation bill of that last session was enacted on March 4, 1917, when war was clearly inevitable and only a month before it was declared; and the great Army appropriation bill of that session was not enacted until a month after war was declared. And yet the Democratic chairman argues that because under these conditions the size of the appropriation bills was greatly increased the Democratic Party is entitled to admiration and confidence.

During all that Congress the world was afire. Was it much to boast of that a Congress under such conditions had spent more money on war preparations than its Republican predecessors in an era of profound peace? It seems to me a pitiable case of misspent enterprise to try to gain credit for the Democratic Party from such figures. I am sorry to see partisan spirit enter that field. I am sorry to see these comparisons between the parties instituted. And I am not only sorry, but I am surprised at the effrontery of a Democrat in initiating the comparison. I think it would have been wiser, as well as more patriotic, for you to have taken the position, in which I would gladly have acquiesced, that those matters pertained to a past which we might well ignore, when many men in both parties failed to foresee the future and prepare for it, when many members of both parties, though far more in the Democratic Party, were deluded into false dreams of perpetual peace, and when only a few statesmen had true vision and foresight and the courage to proclaim and preach it to incredulous hearers.

That attitude of oblivion, to my mind, would have been the wise one for us all to have taken, and it would have been preeminently wise for the Democratic Party. But since the Democratic chairman has seen fit to institute comparisons let me quote from the mouthpiece of the Democratic Party here at the end of the last Republican Congress in 1911. Mr. Livingston, of Georgia, making the critical speech which it has been customary for the man holding his position to make for his party, but which we have omitted since this war broke out, said:

> It is true that in the early years of the present period of control of the Government by the Republican Party we engaged in a combat with a tottering throne, a combat that has gone down in the history of the world as the least bloody struggle between any powers. One would expect, when this lopsided war was over, our expenditures for militarism would again resume normal proportions. But they have not. On the contrary, they have mounted since then with leaps and bounds unheard of before. If this policy is to continue, of having a pistol in every pocket, our national credit will soon be in question and our Treasury drained to the bottom. * * * We are spending annually more than 70 per cent of our revenues for purposes of war in one way or another. * * * The organization of the next Congress will find the control of the House of Representatives in the hands of the Democratic Party. We are for economy all along the line, but more particularly in those departments of the Government relating to the enormous expenditures for war purposes.

And I ask you in all candor if that did not fairly voice the sentiment of the Democratic Party and did not accurately echo the votes which they had cast? And unfortunately for the country they experienced no change of heart until war was upon us.

I do not think this issue as to which party did most to prepare us for war, which the chairman of the Democratic committee precipitates, is one in which the people are much interested or which will cut much figure in the campaign. It does not need refutation by figures. The people know that while neither party had risen to its full duty, yet during the 15 years before this war it was the main body of the Republican Party and its leaders which vigorously favored preparation and it was the main body of the Democratic Party and its leaders which denounced and defeated it. And after the European war began it was the leaders of the Republican Party who agitated for an immediate arming, and forecasted the future so accurately that if their advice had been followed this war would long before this have been ended by our victory, while it was the leaders of the Democratic Party who discredited their fears and sneered at them as unnecessarily nervous and excited. The three men who were most prominent as the evangels of preparedness were Col. Roosevelt, Gen. Wood, and Mr. Gardner, all Republicans. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was among Republicans that their doctrines found most adherents. That they were Republicans is perhaps a coincidence, and perhaps it is only another coincidence that in this Congress there were last winter eight seats unoccupied, four by Democrats, four by Republicans. The aggregate ages of each four were about the same, but the four Democrats had returned to private life from motives of self-interest, in order to increase their pecuniary incomes, while the four Republicans had left the security and comfort of their seats here to serve their country in the fighting ranks of the Army. [Applause on the Republican side.] If they were mere coincidences, they were not discreditable to the Republican Party.

And here is another similar coincidence: A patriotic organization, the National Security League, has recently issued a statement, in which they select eight measures in the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses which they consider most vital to the war, and give the record of Congressmen on those votes. I do not indorse the accuracy of their selection, but I believe it is a nonpartisan, public-spirited organization, with no interest except an intense and single-minded ardor for the success of the war. According to their table seven men voted wrong on all eight of the measures, and of those seven six were Democrats and one was a Republican. Forty-seven men voted right on all eight of the measures, and of them 4 were Democrats and 43 were Republicans. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not maintain that their test was in all respects a just one, but it was made by an impartial, nonpartisan committee, and is one of the significant straws which show that the claim of superior foresight made by the Democratic chairman is ridiculously unfounded.

I dislike to obtrude this partisanship into our counsels here. I do not wish to disparage the patriotism of the Democratic side or to unduly exalt our own. But as you have initiated this comparison of the two parties on the question of preparedness it is but fair that you should be answered and refuted.

I do not think it is an issue which much interests the country now. Wat the country wants is the earnest and successful prosecution of the war, regardless of past records, and it will select the instruments which will best achieve that end. But that same zeal which distinguished the Republican Party in urging preparation has animated it since the war began. I do not wish to institute comparisons of loyalty, but there certainly has been quite as much and as ardent support of the war measures on this side of the Chamber as on that, although the officials to whom we were giving power were not of our selection, and we have vied with you in the earnestness and, I think, surpassed you in the disinterestedness of our support.

And yet the argument is advanced, elect a Democratic Congress in order that the war may be won. Have not the war policies of the President been quite as well supported by the Republicans as by the Democrats? Would not many of the most vital ones have been defeated except for Republican support? I have no acid test for any of my colleagues here. I believe they were all actuated by a high loyalty to their country and their constituents. Particularly unfair do I think it to judge a man by his attitude before the war. But would the support of the war have been any less vigorous if a Republican had been Speaker instead of our honored CHAMP CLARK, who went out of his way to try to defeat the draft? Would the sinews of war have been any less amply or more sectionally provided if a Republican had been at the head of the Ways and Means Committee instead of Mr. KITCHIN, who also voted against the war and against the draft? Would the necessary war legislation have been retarded any more if at that momentous juncture a Republican had been chairman of the Military Committee instead of Mr. DENT, from whose hands the administration program of the draft had to be taken and carried through by a Republican? And so I might proceed with the other committees. Would not the country have felt quite as secure and confident that the necessary war measures would be passed and the necessary powers given to the administration, without selfishness, without partisanship, without political afterthought, if the Republicans were in a majority instead of the Democrats? Of course, under our political system Congress would not have been quite as much under the control of the administration, the power of patronage would be lost, the Postmaster General, for instance, would not have been able to secure the passage of the vicious and sectional zone system of postage, but it is possible that the true needs of the country might have been better met for that very reason. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You are trying to frighten the country into the belief that the Kaiser will think the election of a Republican House indicates that the Nation is half-hearted about the war. Do you think the Kaiser is as ignorant as that? Does he not know that it has been the Republican Party and the Republican leaders who have been most earnest for preparation and national defense? Do you not think he knows whom he has most to fear? Will he think it is favorable to him if the next House is controlled by the party of Roosevelt and Wood and Gardner, by the party of LAGUARDIA and HEINTZ, and JOHNSON, who left their seats here to try to put bullets into his well-protected sons? Will he expect less hostile and effective legislation under a Republican Speaker and a Republican leader of the majority and a Republican chairman of the Military Committee? Is there any basis for the argument? You say Republicans made the same argument during the Civil War and during the Spanish-American War, but it is not a fair comparison. At the climax of the Civil War the Democratic national platform declared that the war was a failure and that we must yield. During the Spanish War the solid Democratic Party, with but six exceptions, voted against the bill to raise the revenue for the war. We, on the contrary, have in this war supported as cheerfully as you the most drastic legislation and have ungrudgingly assisted you to grant to the President the most extraordinary and dangerous powers, because our intense zeal for the war overcame our normal attitude as a minority. [Applause on the Republican side.] We will not be less loyal as a majority. I believe there never has been a time when a strong minority, almost equal in numbers to the majority, has so suppressed partisanship and criticism and so effaced its organization in wholehearted support of its political opponents. And if the next House is Republican, as a majority we will again show the same spirit which has actuated us as a minority, and instead of following your lead, as we are compelled to now, we will be an initiating, pushing, energizing force for the equipment and support of our brave armies in the field. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I believe such a result would bring gloom and doom to the Kaiser and not encouragement. He knows who have been his fiercest foes and who he has most reason to fear.

There is another reason why the next House should be Republican. The next Congress, although elected this November, does not regularly begin its work until the first Monday of December, 1919. Before then we all hope that the war will be ended. Then this country will face problems quite as difficult as have ever confronted it. The industrial upheaval which this war has caused must be gradually turned again into the permanent grooves of peace. The changes in our industrial centers will be peculiarly disturbing, and will cause innumerable hardships and antagonisms. To deal with these will require our best wisdom and statesmanship. The next Congress must cope with these problems. Which party can be best trusted? The great industrial centers, like the great bulk of the population, are north of Mason and Dixon's line, and yet if there is a Democratic majority the chairman of every important committee without exception, all the men of greatest influence in legislation, will live south of Mason and Dixon's line as they do today. And under the caucus system which the Democratic Party has adopted and ruthlessly enforced any stray Democrats from the North are bound helplessly to assist in carrying out the decree of the majority. Should not that section which is most directly and vitally interested, which has an enormous preponderance of population, whose contributions and taxes mainly support the Government, have most influence when their fate comes to be settled? The country is normally Republican. It was only by our dissension that the Democrats won power. Now, that we are again happily united should not our policies, the policies of a majority of the people, again prevail? In time of war we have no partisan policies, but when peace again encompasses us I believe we are best fitted to solve its problems. [Applause on Republican side.]

I dislike to make a sectional and partisan argument. In this Congress we have lived together in such harmony and worked with such cordial good will, ignoring party and sectional lines, that I regret that any discordant words should interpose. I have such thorough respect for the loyalty and patriotism of everyone on that side of the Chamber, as well as on this, such a personal affection for our honored Speaker, that I should like to have had the issue this year submitted to the people without argument. But you have forced the issue upon us. You have formulated acid tests, though you have claimed that the same acid washed a Democrat pure, but deeply stained a Republican. [Laughter.] When you issued that advertisement:

To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant: President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for J. E. Davies. Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin. Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.

You initiated a despicable attack on the patriotism of the Republican Party for which you ought to be ashamed and ought to suffer. The election of that sterling and patriotic statesman, Senator LENROOT, may have caused a little gloom in certain circles in Washington, but I do not believe it caused one ripple of joy in Berlin. It furnished another strong Republican arm in the Senate to drive nails in the Kaiser's coffin.

To that kind of campaign we will not resort. We will not even suggest a doubt as to your full loyalty, despite the acid tests. But we do think our record entitles us to claim that if we control the next Congress there will be vigorous and unstinted legislation for every war purpose. There will be no appropriation refused, however enormous, no power withheld, however dangerous, if only they seem likely to hasten the war. And so the election of a Republican House should cause joy to our allies and all the Kaiser's enemies. It may cause regret, and I hope some shame, to those who have used such barefaced arguments. It will cause regret doubtless to those thoroughgoing Democrats who can never believe there is any patriotism or any wisdom in their political opponents. It may cause regret to those who want simply a smooth-running party machine here without will power or initiative, only able to obey commands. But only a blinded, venomous partisan can really believe or claim that there will be any faltering in war legislation, no matter which party controls the next House. And those who believe in the principles of the Republican Party, who distrust the theories and the composition of the Democratic Party, who want an energetic, initiating force here to urge on the vigorous prosecution of the war, and who want an unfettered and fearless handling of the great problems which the war will bequeath to us, can labor with good conscience and assurance for the substantial Republican majority which indications promise us. [Prolonged applause on Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a special order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is recognized for 45 minutes.

By unanimous consent, Mr. COLLIER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

THE WORLD-WIDE WAR.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th day of June, 1914, there appeared in the headlines of the press, both here and abroad, a startling announcement of the assassination, the day before, by a young student named Gabrilo Princip, of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife in the capital of the newly acquired Austrian Province of Bosnia. Few, indeed, who read the announcement of the assassination of the heir to the throne of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy realized that this abominable crime would be the spark setting fire to a conflagration which would soon spread over the greater part of Europe and, gathering intensity as it swept on, finally reach the uttermost confines of the earth.

In the minds of many this brutal murder produced a feeling of profound sympathy for the aged and unhappy Francis Joseph, who in his long life had experienced so many sorrows. Little significance other than this was accorded, and the crime at Sarajevo was soon dismissed as another dark and tragic chapter in the history of the ill-fated house of Hapsburg.

No family in Europe has so tragic a history, and for nearly three-quarters of a century it seems as though a curse had been laid upon almost every member of that unfortunate family. The Hapsburgs are one of the oldest and most aristocratic of all the reigning houses of Europe. Ardent supporters of the Roman Church, the Hapsburgs, for reasons of state, could marry only into reigning Catholic families. They were, therefore, restricted to few reigning families of that faith—the Wittelsbachs, of Bavaria; the Bourbons, of Spain; the house of Savoy, in Italy; the Albertine line, in Saxony; and the Cobergs, of Belgium.

The feeling of hatred and antagonism which for nearly two centuries had existed between Austria and Italy eliminated the house of Savoy as a matrimonial market for the Hapsburgs, and the lineage of the Cobergs was not ancient enough to suit the autocratic tastes of the most aristocratic family in all Europe, though Rudolph, the unhappy son of Francis Joseph, married a Coberg, Stephanie, the daughter of the King of Belgium.

So the marriages of the Hapsburgs were limited to one or two families, notably the Wittelsbachs, of Bavaria. Such intermarrying of close relations was not without fateful and unhappy results.

Francis Joseph, who married his cousin, Elizabeth, of Wittelsbach, was an epileptic, as was also his grandfather, Francis I. This malady was transmitted to his son, the Crown Prince Rudolph, and his daughter, Marie Velerie, who married her cousin, Francis Salvador, of Wittelsbach, himself an epileptic. A cousin, Ludwig, of Bavaria, went mad and committed suicide. Another cousin, Otho, King of Bavaria, was violently insane and was confined in an asylum for years. Charlotte, the sister of Francis Joseph, and the wife of the ill-fated Maxmilian, lost her mind and was hopelessly insane. Tragedy seemed to follow closely almost every member of the Hapsburg family. The brother of Francis Joseph, Archduke Johan, was lost at sea. A cousin, a young girl dying from consumption, while smoking a cigarette, set her clothes on fire and was burned to death. His nephew, Archduke Lazlo, was accidently shot and killed while out hunting. Maxmilian, the husband of his mad sister, Charlottee, attempted to establish a throne in Mexico, and he fell by Mexican bullets before the guns of a firing squad. The Princess Louise left her husband, the King of Saxony, and deserting her children, ran away with a young Belgian tutor, while the brother of the princess ran off with an actress. Francis Joseph's only son, the Crown Prince Rudolph, who lived unhappily with his wife, Stephanie of Coberg, became infatuated with a beautiful adventuress, the Baroness Marie Vetschera. They were both found dead in the hunting lodge at Mayerling, the woman evidently had been strangled, while the crown prince, badly mutilated, supposedly with a razor, committed suicide by putting the muzzle of a rifle in his mouth and blowing his head completely to pieces.

But sorrow's crown of sorrow yet waited for the aged Emperor, for his wife, the once beautiful Elizabeth, whom he had led to the altar 45 years before, was stabbed to death in 1898 at Geneva by Luchienni, an Italian anarchist, and in June, 1914, his nephew, Franz Ferdinand, and his wife, the Archduchess Sophia, were shot and killed at Sarajevo.

So, in the minds of many, the tragic death of the heir to the throne of the dual monarchy had no more real significance other than to add another dark chapter to the sorrowful life of the aged ruler of Austria-Hungary.

The crime of Sarajevo was, however, no more the cause of the present great war than was the munition maker, who made the gun from which came the missile which sank the Lusitania the cause of the destruction of that noble vessel. This crime was a pretext eagerly seized upon by Germany to put into execution the beginning of a plan of world-wide dominion and control of territory far greater in its character and more important in its wealth and resources than ever Alexander seized or Rome coveted.

The intense hated between Serbia and Austria and the feeling of indignation at Vienna over the assassination at once brought those two countries face to face with war, when it was directly charged that Serbia was responsible for the crime and that the details of the plot to murder the heir to the Austrian throne were carefully planned at Belgrade.

Serbia, the greatest, the most warlike, and the most important of all the Balkan States, was the chief obstacle to Austria's ambitious plans for control and acquisition of territory in the Balkan Peninsula. Only six years before Austria, in violation of a solemn treaty, had forcibly annexed the Balkan States of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and was greedy for more territory and more expansion. Bounded on the north by its ally, the great German Empire, and on the east by Russia, expansion of Austria could come only from the south. In this plan of Austrian control Germany fully concurred, because it was only through the Balkan Peninsula that Germany could extend its operations in the east and secure an outlet upon the Ægean, Adriatic, and Mediterranean Seas. It was therefore essential to German ambition that Serbia be either dismembered or destroyed.

The Balkan Peninsula was the scene of much strife and turmoil, and the different Balkan States were frequently fighting among themselves. That much of this turmoil and fighting was the result of Austrian diplomacy there can be little doubt. There was for a while intense rivalry between Serbia and Bulgaria for supremacy in the Balkans, but Serbia had in recent wars completely demonstrated that the title to supremacy in Balkan affairs was hers. Serbia, dismembered, would have removed the chief obstacle of Austria's control in the peninsula and at the same time would put an end to the Serbian propaganda of hate which was the cause of much disquiet and unrest in the Slavonic Provinces of the dual monarchy. Over 40 per cent of the Austrian population was Slavonic. Many of these Slavs were ripe for revolt, and a confederated Balkan Peninsula was the least desirable of all things to Austria. Though a small power, yet Serbia also had dreams of empire. She had already shown military ability of the highest order. The blood of her people being almost purely Slavonic, there was a strong affinity between Serbia and the Russian Empire. Unquestionably historical, cultural, military, and racial right to supremacy in the Balkans belong to Serbia. She was bound by ties of blood and interest to Montenegro, the only Balkan State which never surrendered to the Turk. A footing upon either the Adriatic or Ægean Seas would in a short time develop Serbia into a great commercial nation and would mean the emancipation of all the southern Balkan territory from Turkey. The dream of Serbia was a united Slavonic Balkan confederacy, with Serbia occupying practically the same position in this confederacy that Prussia occupied in the German confederation. It is extremely doubtful whether this could ever have been accomplished. Certainly, however, no other Balkan State was capable of bringing about this confederation. Always in dread of Austrian encroachment, an intense hatred sprang up between the two countries, which was intensified on the one hand by the activity of secret societies supposed to be backed by the Government of Serbia intriguing and spreading dissatisfaction among the Austrian Slavonic Provinces, and on the other by the annexation by Austria of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the fear of further encroachment.

The Bosnians and the Herzegovinians resembled their Serbian neighbors in thought, in racial characteristics, and in appearance. They have the same race pride, the same love of country, of poetry, of music, and of romance. They have the same superstitions, the same customs, and speak the same language as the Serbians. Up to 1878 Bosnia and Herzegovina were nominally Turkish Provinces and had repeatedly attempted to throw off the Turkish yoke. At the completion of the Turko-Russian War, by the terms of the treaty of Berlin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the consent of the other powers, were transferred to their powerful neighbors on the north, with the distinct understanding that when order and tranquility had been restored Austria would withdraw and permit them to become independent States. But in 1908 Austria, with the approval of Germany, and taking advantage of Russia's weakened and demoralized condition after the Japanese War, and the domestic troubles then convulsing Great Britain, repudiated the treaty of Berlin and annexed both Bosnia and Herzegovina. Russia, Great Britain, and the other powers at once entered vigorous protests which were met with an emphatic declaration from Germany that Austria's aggression in Balkan territory would brook no interference. It was made plain by the Imperial German Government that in Balkan affairs the cause of Austria was also the cause of Germany. The other powers submitted, but this annexation aroused great excitement and intense resentment in Serbia. For so closely did the Bosnians and the Herzegovinians resemble the Serbs that Serbia felt as though part of her own territory had been seized by Austria. The natives of the annexed Provinces, already intensely antagonistic to Austria, were also much incensed by the high-handed way in which Austria had repudiated the treaty of Berlin and annexed them without their will or consent. This act of Austria was the cause of the Serbians increasing the propaganda of hate and dissatisfaction which had been industriously spread in all the Balkan territory under Austrian control.

A confederation or political alliance of the Balkan Peninsula would have united, roughly speaking, a territory of about 237,000 square miles, with a population of over 27,000,000. This, however, would include Greece, with about 25,000 square miles and a population of about two and a half millions. It would also include what is left of the Turkish dominion in Europe. This federation or alliance of over 27,000,000, with Serbia the dominant and commanding power, would not only have so commanded the respect of the other powers, and especially Russia, that it would have been a decided check to the ambitious plans of dominion for Germany; but what was far more important to Austria would have been a source of constant anxiety for fear the Slavs in Austria, already discontented and ripe for revolt, would, relying on the power of the federation, be continually tempted to rebel and throw off the Austrian yoke. Bosnia and Herzegovina, with a population of over 2,000,000; Dalmatia, with over 700,000; and Croatia-Slavonia, with over 1,200,000, were eagerly waiting an opportunity to revolt, while in the north Bohemia, the richest part of all Austria-Hungary, with its 6,500,000 people, were eagerly awaiting any kind of an opportunity to throw off the Austrian rule.

The Serbians were keenly aware of the importance both to Austria and Germany that Serbia should be destroyed. Once Serbia was dismembered and partitioned among the greedy Balkan States the central powers had little to fear, as only the genius and the primacy of Serbia could effect any kind of confederation or organization in the Balkans.

Knowing this, the Serbians, on several occasions, in order to avoid a conflict which, unaided, would have meant their ruin, submitted to much humiliation.

Austrian control of the Balkans would have been practically the same thing as German control of the peninsula, and without this control there would have been no opportunity for Germany to extend its operations in the east. It was only through the country of Serbia that a railroad could be projected and operated from Berlin to Bagdad, in the territory of the Turk. It was only through Serbia that a branch of this railroad could be extended through the northern part of Greece to the seaport of Salonika, in the domains of the Kaiser's brother-in-law, the King of Greece, thus opening the ports of the Adriatic, Ægean, and Mediterranean Seas to German commerce and affording other markets to a country whose commerce, based upon the complete development of every natural resource, together with the most approved intensive and scientific methods, was continually increasing.

Germany was becoming overcrowded, her commerce demanded new markets, and the time was ripe for the Kaiser to test the war machine which for nearly 40 years he had been building up in order to carry out his ambitious dream of world power and world domination.

Since the fifteenth century, when the rude robber barons of the Hohenzollerns first came into notice, ambition, greed of power, and an insatiable desire to prey upon their weaker neighbors marked their conduct. In the early days the Hohenzollern estate was but a small feudatory; but, animated by a consuming ambition for place and power, by chicanery and by the sword the strength of the Hohenzollerns grew, until at last one of the house reached the dignity of an elector. The power of the Hohenzollerns continued to increase, though their influence in large affairs was more or less inconsiderable until the days of the great elector, perhaps the greatest of all the Hohenzollerns and the model from which the present Kaiser loves to copy. By his ability and shrewdness his son, Frederick, became the first King of Prussia, and since then the Hohenzollerns have been the incarnate spirit, the very embodiment of military preparation and the most conspicuous example of military and arbitrary force of any nation in the world. With the Hohenzollerns greed for territory has been a mania. They held what they once acquired and immediately began to Prussianize the territory often acquired with the merest shadow of right, and the Prussian manners, customs, and military spirit was in a short time so indelibly impressed upon the new territory that it soon partook of practically all of the characteristics of the old. By steadfastly and inexorably pursuing this policy the small State of Brandenburg, with only 15,000 square miles and a population of only about 4,000,000 people, from the latter part of the fifteenth century has developed into the mighty German Empire of to-day, ruled over by a Hohenzollern Kaiser, who, notwithstanding over a million and a half of his best men have been slain on the battle fields of Europe and nearly all of Christendom is arrayed against him, still dreams of German kultur dominating the rest of the world.

Brandenburg, in the seventeeth century, acquired Pomerania, with over 1,700,000 inhabitants, East Prussia, with a population of over 2,000,000, and the towns of Halle, Magdeburg, Hallestadt, Ruzberger, Rippin, and Linden, and all of this territory soon absorbed the Hohenzollern ideas of military force. The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries up to 1870 saw a great development and growth of Prussia. There was acquired West Prussia, with over 2,000,000 inhabitants; Silesia, with over 5,000,000; Posen, with 2,000,000 inhabitants; the Province of the Rhine, with over 7,000,000; Westphalia, with over 4,000,000; the rest of Pomerania; a great slice of Hanover; and numberless cities and towns. This was the Kingdom of Prussia which in 1866, completely and decisively defeating Austria, in 1870 eagerly welcomed the blunders of Napoleon III and in a few months overran France and seized all of Alsace and a great part of Lorraine. The easy victories over Austria and France so increased the prestige of the Kingdom of Prussia that it was comparatively easy for Bismarck to persuade the rest of Germany to come into a federation with Prussia at the head and form the German Empire.

Master of a great part of Europe and practically controlling the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, there was born in the mind of the present Hohenzollern ruler a mad dream to extend German kultur throughout the world, and all the vast resources of his mighty empire for nearly half a century were utilized for this great venture.

While this dream of world power was born in the mind of the Kaiser and Bismarck, Von Moltke and many others were not free from this delusion; yet there is little evidence to show that the masses of the German people at first shared the ambitious dream. Therefore two gigantic problems faced the Kaiser. First, how to create in the German mind a belief that the German people were the elect of God, commissioned from on high to extend German kultur and German thought throughout the world, and, second, how to build up a war machine of such proportions and efficiency as to make possible the gigantic plan of universal dominion.

This the Kaiser and his advisers proceeded to do. Propaganda worthy of the days of Philip of Macedon was industriously circulated and distributed throughout the Empire.

It was first necessary to impress the German people with the idea of Germany's importance, to firmly imbue their minds with a conviction that they were not like the people of other nations, but that the Germans were a superior kind of supermen, being cast from a different mold from their fellows. Of all the passions played upon, vanity perhaps yields the most fruitful results. It is human nature to believe what we would like to believe, the wish often being the father to the thought.

Upon the lecture platform, in the schools, and in the churches the Germans were fed so continually with fulsome praise of themselves that the German population soon became obsessed with the idea that they were the elect of the earth and that, like the children of Israel, they, too, were God's chosen people.

The Kaiser solemnly announced that "the world will one day be made whole again through the efficacy of the German character." "The German people are the elect of God, and their enemies are His enemies," declared the chiefs of the intellectuals, while the learned Prof. Eucken, of the faculty of Jena, taught that "To us, more than any other nation, is intrusted the true structure of human existence, and we have the right to say that we form the soul of humanity."

Dr. Adolf Lassen, privy counselor to the Kaiser, wrote:

> We are morally and intellectually superior to all others, without equals. We have no friends. All fear us and look upon us as dangerous, because we are intelligent and active and morally superior to all.

Said Fritz Bley:

> We are the most gifted of nations in all the domains of science and art. We are the best colonists, the best sailors, and even the best traders.

There appeared in the Alldeutsche Blatter the following modest statement:

> The hatred bestowed upon us by the whole world may be classified as the hatred of an inferior race for a superior one.

Referring to his grandfather in 1897, the Kaiser said:

> He left Coblenz to ascend the throne as the selected instrument of the Lord, as he always regarded himself to be. For us all, and above all for us princes, he raised once more aloft and lent lustrous beams to a jewel which we should hold high and holy—that is, the kingship by God's grace; the kingship, with its onerous duties, its never-ending, ever-continuing trouble and labor, with its fearful responsibility to the Creator alone, from which no human being, no minister, no parliament, no people can release the prince.

A long step, truly, from the rude robber barons of the Hohenzollerns of the fifteenth century to the self-appointed agent of God in the twentieth.

Again, said the Kaiser:

> The great ideals which have been lost, more or less, by other nations have become for us Germans permanent possessions.

Says Von Buelow, the imperial chancellor:

> We Germans are the most learned people of the earth and at the same time the most capable in war. The greatest philosophers, the greatest writers, the greatest musicians are Germans. The military and intellectual deeds of the Germans are unequaled.

And so on, ad nauseam. An important newspaper published that—

> The German tongue acts as a blessing upon all men. Coming direct from the hand of God, this blessing sinks into the heart like a precious balm and ennobles it.

And this fulsome propaganda of self-gratulation was so eagerly devoured by the German people that they really began to believe the German was the elect of the Lord and the salt of the earth,

Said Vernon Kellogg, in the Atlantic Monthly, in writing of the way in which the industrious spread of this kind of propaganda influenced the German mind:

And they fight not simply because they are forced to, but because, curiously enough, they believe much of their talk. That is one of the dangers of the Germans to which the world is exposed; they really believe much of what they say.

Reiteration and repetition by the author of a falsehood has, in many instances, actually created an impression on the mind of the person guilty of remaking the false statement as to leave it in doubt as to whether the statement be true or false. The mind once in this condition, the transition from doubt to certainty is assured, the false story becomes real, and the author of a statement he once knew to be untrue finally believes the occurrence related an actual fact. So is it with the Germans, and there can be little doubt that they are conscientious in their belief that they themselves are truly selected by God as His instrument to take care of and direct the destinies of the world.

Maximilian Hardin, one of Germany's greatest editors, wrote, in commenting on the aims of Germany in the war:

We wage it from the lofty point of view and with the conviction that Germany, as a result of her achievements and in proportion to them, is justified in asking and must obtain wider room on earth for development and for working out the possibilities that are in her. * * * Not only for the territories that are to feed their children and grandchildren is this warrior host now battling, but also for the conquering triumph of the German genius.

Says the Kaiser, 14 years before the war, that he hopes the German people "will become in the future as closely united, as powerful, and as authoritative as once the Roman world Empire was," and that just as in the old times they said, "Civis Romanus sum," hereafter, at some time in the future, they will say, "I am a German citizen."

After the German mind had become imbued with the idea of German superiority in all things the next step was to convince the German people that God gave them superior intellects, superior culture, and superior gifts in order that they might transmit these blessings to the people of other nations.

In 1890, the Kaiser said in a public speech to his soldiers:

I look upon the people and nation handed on to me as a responsibility conferred upon me by God; and that it is, as is written in the Bible, my duty to increase this heritage, for which one day I shall be called upon to give an account. Those who try to interfere with my task I shall crush.

At the launching of the battleship Wittelsbache, the Kaiser announced:

The ocean teaches us that on its waves and on its most distant shores no great decision can any longer be taken without Germany and without the German Emperor. I do not think that it was in order to allow themselves to be excluded from big foreign affairs that 30 years ago our people, led by their princes, conquered and shed their blood. Were the German people to let themselves be treated thus it would be, and forever, the end of their world power; and I do not mean that that shall ever cease. To employ, in order to prevent it, the suitable means, if need be, extreme means, is my duty and my highest privilege.

Again, he said:

We demand our place in the sun * * * our future lies on the water * * * the trident should be in our hand * * * Germany looks ahead. Her horizons stretch far away. She must be prepared for any eventualities in the Far East. Who can foresee what may take place in the Pacific in the days to come—days not so far distant as some believe?

Again, says the Kaiser:

From childhood I have been influenced by five men—Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, Theodoric II, Frederick the Great, and Napoleon. Each dreamed of world empire. They failed. I have dreamed of German world dominion and my mailed fist shall succeed.

Says the Kaloniale Zulschrift, in January, 1900:

The old century saw a German Empire; the new one shall see a German world.

Maximilian Harden declared in Die Zukunft:

After all it is visibly the meaning of history that the white race under the leadership of the Germans shall arrive at the real and ultimate dominion of the world.

Said Prof. von Seyden, in the Frankfurter Zeitung:

Germany should and wishes to be let alone. The Germans are the elect people of the earth. They will accomplish their destiny, which is to govern the world and direct the other nations for the welfare of humanity.

Just a year before the war an official German report recites, in part:

Neither ridiculous shriekings for revenge by French Chauvinists nor the Englishman's gnashing of teeth, nor the wild gestures of the Slav will turn us from our aim of protecting and extending German influence all the world over. It is our sacred duty to sharpen the sword that has been put into our hands and to hold it ready for defense as well as for offense * * * We must accustom them (our people) to think that an offensive war on our part is a necessity. * * * We must stir up troubles in the north of Africa and in Russia. In the next European war it will also be necessary that the small States shall be forced to follow us or be subdued. In certain conditions their armies and their fortified places can be rapidly conquered or neutralized; this would probably be the case with Belgium and Holland.

Recites one of the Pan-Germanic works:

Our fathers have left us much to do. The German people is so situated in Europe that it needs only to run and take whatever it requires. The German people finds itself to-day in a plight similar to that of Prussia at the accession of Frederick the Great, who raised his country to the status of a European power. To-day it is for Germany to rise from a European to a world power. * * * Public policy prompted by the emotions (Gefuhlspolitik) is stupidity. Humanitarian dreams are imbecility. Diplomatic charity begins at home. Statesmanship is business. Right and wrong are notions indispensable in private life. The German people are always right because they number 87,000,000 souls.

We find the minds of the German people now obsessed with two prevailing ideas: First, that they are superior to the rest of mankind; and, second, that it is their duty, for the good of humanity, to rule over all mankind. That it is a mission handed down from the throne of Almighty God to them to extend this influence all the world over. Now, the question presented itself to the propagandists: How can this be done? What are the means whereby other nations can receive this kultur which we think, like "the German tongue, sinks into the heart and ennobles it like a precious balm."

The Kaiser always admired the Turk. So, going back to Mohammed for his inspiration, he paraphrased their slogan of "Islam or the sword" by declaring Prussian kultur and German influence or the sword. So, then, the professors and publicists and editors and others were set to work to mold public opinion into a firm belief that war was an ordinance set by God, and that it was both righteous and holy to extend their influence by the sword.

Again, in the press, upon the lecture platform, in the schools, and in the churches the German people were taught to despise peace and to glorify war. They were taught to believe that the highest aim of Government is to be successful in war, and that it is the only remedy for ailing nations. Says Bernhardi three years before the war:

Our next war will be fought for the highest interests of our country. This will invest it with importance in the world's history. World power or downfall will be our rallying cry.

Writes Maximillian Hardin long before the war:

All Morocco in the hands of Germany. German cannon on the routes to Egypt and India; German troops on the Algerian frontier; this would be a goal worthy of great sacrifices.

Says the Deutsch Kurier:

It is on the soil of Europe which has been fertilized by blood that there is growing up for us a German crop, and we shall still the tears of those who have given their dear ones if we can say to them, "Thy son, thy husband has fallen for this greater and stronger Germany—bloody sacrifices have been offered, and more will fall; they must provide the foundation for a territorial expansion of our country, for boundaries in the east and west which will secure us peace for a generation."

Karl von Winterstetten said:

From this it appear that for Germany this war is the decisive step toward a real world policy, which she was compelled to take because the triple entente, that syndicate of great land monopolists, prevented her from expansion, from obtaining the elbow room which she requires by peaceful means. We must therefore look upon this war as necessary for two reasons—it is not only a question of finally repelling the advance of Pan Slavism, but also of opening up a way for the German people to ascend to the rank of a world power.

Said one of their deputies, Bassermann:

We know it; the German eagle will victoriously unfold his pinions and ascend to a prouder height than ever. And we shall also know how to keep a firm hold for all time to come on the countries which are fertilized with German blood. Our ardent love for our German fatherland makes us strong to make the greatest sacrifices. But let us therefore also keep a firm hold on what we have won and acquire in addition what we need. Beyond bloody war is splendid victory—let that be the watchword of this great time.

Werner Sombart, one of the leading German economists and professor in the Handelshochschule, in Berlin, modestly wrote:

As the German eagle soars high above the beasts of the earth so must the German feel exalted above all surrounding peoples and must look down upon them in their bottomless depths.

Bernhardi, an intellectual war-crazed fanatic, whose writings produced a profound impression on the minds of the German people, wrote that "war is a divine institution, more noble than dispensing justice." He writes of "the sanctity of war" and insists that "a State can not commit a crime, and that its highest duty is to increase its power; that between one State and another there can be no law; that a war of conquest is as legitimate as a defensive war; and that the maintenance of peace ought never to be a political aim."

He goes even further, and after declaring that war was "the force which propagated the finest flower of civilization" and was "the only efficient school of heroism," that "the efforts toward the abolition of war must not only be termed foolish but absolutely immoral and must be described as unworthy of the human race."

Gen. von Molke, Germany's great military commander, the hero of the Franco-Prussian War, stated that "war is an ordinance set by God." Bismarck, the greatest of all latter-day Germans, taught that "where the power of Prussia is concerned, I know no law." A doctrine of supreme selfishness handed down to his successors and exemplified by contemptuously characterizing a solemn treaty with five great nations of the earth as a "mere scrap of paper."

Treitschke wrote:

He who knows history knows that it would positively be a mutilation of human nature if we tried to banish war from the world.

He again stated that the two chief functions of a State were to administer the law within its borders and make war.

The chiefs of the intellectuals already referred to in justifying Germany's immense military program, stated:

Without our militarism our civilization would have been annihilated long ago. It was to protect our civilization that militarism was born in our country.

Lamprecht, in writing of that kultur so superior to the rest of the world, declared:

That the moral value of a form of culture is its force. Culture exists in order to manifest itself as force.

Said Bismarck again:

Force creates right; war is a natural law.

Said Maxmilian Hardin, Germany's greatest journalist:

It was Germany's declared will to engage in universal war as a national industry.

Marshal von Haesseler declared:

If a people have the right of dominion, its power of conquest constitutes the highest moral law, and before it the vanquished must bow. Woe unto the vanquished.

Frederick Neitsche, one of the leading writers of Germany, wrote that—

Ye shall love peace as a means to new wars, and the short peace better than the long. I do not advise you to work, but to fight. I do not advise you to compromise and make peace, but to conquer. * * * Let your labor be fighting and your peace victory. You say that a good cause hallows even war. I tell you that a good war hallows every cause.

It was natural that these writings and preachings and sayings of Germany's most intellectual men in advocating war should produce a profound impression upon the German mind. But this impression was inconsiderable as compared with the moral effect produced by the actual military preparations which were continually going on before their eyes. Every young man was by law forced to enter the army and was imbued from early manhood with military traditions and military ideas. The manufacture of the new and improved implements of war at the great Krupp factory at Essen, the rapid development and growth of a large navy, all tended to stimulate the German mind into a belief that the time was ripe to test this wonderful war machine nearly 50 years of assiduous labor had been building and to begin the gigantic plan for world-wide control, so that the blessings of German kultur might be felt throughout the earth.

It is by no means strange that a people whose vanity had for nearly half a century been pampered by the fulsome praise of their own superiority from the lips of so many intellectual men, and who had become obsessed with an idea that the highest aim of any Government was to conduct for conquest against their weaker neighbors a successful war; it is by no means strange that minds becoming obsessed with such thoughts would naturally look with complacency upon any means of passion, terrorism, and violence which were necessary to attain the objects sought. And especially was this true in Germany where the same propagandists began to teach this doctrine. Said the Kaiser:

Remember when you meet the foe that no quarter will be given and no prisoners will be taken.

Haackel said, "Force takes priority over right"; Clausman stated, "All idea of philanthropy in war is a pernicious error"; while Treitschke taught that "We have learned to know the moral majesty of war in the very thing that to superficial observers appears brutal and inhuman."

Erzberger, a leader of the Conservative Party in the Reichstag, who is now sick and tired of this war and who has been clamoring for peace, declared that "this war ought to be as pitiless as possible."

Said Baron von Bessing, who was much surprised at the indignant clamor which arose after the brutal murder of Miss Edith Cavell, a nurse whose gentle ministrations among the sick and wounded soldiers knew no distinctions of country: "When thousands of innocent people have died in the war, why should anyone become hysterical over the death of one guilty woman?"

The vice chancellor, Bismarck, declared:

True strategy consists in hitting your enemy and hitting him hard. * * * Above all you must inflict on the inhabitants of invaded towns the maximum of suffering. You must leave the people through whom you march only their eyes to weep with.

That this lesson was well learned by the Germans none know better than the bleeding inhabitants of poor, desolate, destroyed Belgium. Bismarck, however, went further, and again stated:

If we can not provide troops for the whole of the territory which we occupy, we send a flying column from time to time among the recalcitrant communities. We shoot, hang, and burn. After that has been done several times they end by becoming reasonable.

Gen. von Disfurth arrogantly stated in a public interview in answer to criticism of Germany's savage, barbaric warfare against the noncombatants of Belgium that—

Germany stands as the supreme arbiter of her own methods, which in time of war the world must be compelled to accept. * * * For my part, I hope that we have merited in this war the title of barbarians.

Admiral von Tirpitz, in gloating over the destruction of the Lusitania and the murder of hundreds of defenseless men, women, and children, declared that the allies' ships should be sunk without warning, and, according to reports in the press, one German officer high in rank stated "it were much better all on board perished, as it would strike terror to the hearts of the enemies of Germany."

Civilization may well stand aghast at the exemplification of German kultur as applied to Belgium, to Roumania, and to Serbia, and well is it for civilization that it stands together and makes common cause against a common enemy, whose crimes, outrages, and excesses are unparalleled in the pages of history.

Is it strange that German soldiers murdered helpess old men, tortured defenseless children, and violated gentle women when the men of God, the preachers of the gospel, like Pastor J. Rump, in the pulpit of an edifice dedicated to the God of Love and Mercy and consecrated to the gentle teachings of the Prince of Peace, at the very time Belgium lay bleeding at the oppressor's feet, thundered:

Take heed that ye be counted amongst the blessed who show declining England, corrupt Belgium, licentious France, uncouth Russia, the unconquerable youthful power and manhood of the German people in a manner never to be forgotten. * * * Brethren, make an end of this generation of vipers with German blows and German thrusts.

There was published in Germany an official organ called the Jung Deutschland, and it is published for the purpose of exerting an influence over the minds of the young boys of the Empire. It is a publication adapted for the use of children, and it has the official sanction of the Imperial Government. Some time before the beginning of the European war there appeared in the columns of this official organ the following lofty sentiments for the edification of the children of Germany:

War is the noblest and hollest expression of human activity. For us, too, the glad great hour of battle will strike. Still and deep in the German heart must live the joy of battle and the longing for it. Let us ridicule to the utmost the old women in breeches who fear war and deplore it as cruel and revolting. * * *. its august sublimity elevates the human heart beyond the earthly and the common. In the cloud palace above sit the heroes, Frederick the Great and Blucher, and all the men of action. The great Emperor, Moltke, Roon, Bismarck are there as well, but not the old women who take away our joy in war. When here on earth a battle is won by German arms and the faithful dead ascend to heaven, a Potsdam lance corporal will call the guard to the door, and "Old Fritz" (Frederick the Great), springing from his golden throne, will give the command to present arms. That is the heaven of young Germany.

The Book of Books tells us:

And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones who believes in Me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into the sea.

What greater offense can there be against the "little ones" and against all of Christendom than for official Germany to attempt to impress upon the minds of the little children of the Empire a belief that those who teach the doctrine of Him who, on Calvary's cross, gave up his life so that peace on earth, good will to men, might be the heritage of mankind; what greater offense can there be to the children themselves than to teach that those who humbly follow the lowly Nazarene are forbidden entrance to the gates of heaven, which swing open only to those who repudiate Christ's teachings?

Is there cause for wonder that a German soldier should exult and delight in the mutilation and torture of the child of an enemy when his pastor and spiritual adviser, in commenting upon the murder of hundreds of women and children on the ill-fated Lusitania, should exult as Pastor B. Baumgarten exulted, as he said:

Whoever can not prevail upon himself to approve from the bottom of his heart the sinking of the Lusitania, whoever can not conquer his sense of the gigantic cruelty to unnumbered perfectly innocent victims * * * and give himself up to the honest delight at this victorious exploit of German defensive power, him we judge to be no true German.

With what little value the Germans regard the lives of those not of the Germanic blood is well illustrated by the saying of Prof. Haeckel, one of the best-known zoologists in the world. He modestly said:

One single highly cultivated German warrior of those who are, alas, falling in thousands, represents a higher intellectual and moral life value than hundreds of the raw children of nature whom England and France, Russia and Italy oppose to them.

German kultur teaches that the German people are morally superior to other peoples. How have they shown their kultur? How have they proved their morals? How have they exemplified their superiority? What does this boasted superiority stand for? What does German kultur mean?

It means soldiers going into guiltless, unhappy, defenseless Belgium and committing outrages which would have brought the blush of shame to the face of an aboriginal untutored savage. It means the wholesale violation of young girls before their anguished parents' eyes. It means holding up a white flag and firing on the unsuspecting soldiers as they approached. It means the slaughter of defenseless men, the bayoneting of little children, and the murder of gentlewomen. It means dropping bombs upon sleeping cities where women and children were torn and mangled beyond all recognition. It means the burning and destruction of Red Cross hospitals. It means deporting the men to work in the fields of Germany, leaving the wives and little ones at home to starve. It means cutting off the breasts of women and the hands of boys and girls. It means using helpless men, women, and children as human screens, forcing them to go before the German attack to be shot down by their friends. It means stealthily, silently creeping up on an unsuspecting passenger vessel and sending it to the bottom of the sea, and as the men, women, and children flounder, half strangled, drowning in the water, German kultur means that German bullets shall complete the work the torpedo started.

The murder of Capt. Fryatt and Miss Edith Cavell are true and striking exemplifications of German kultur. Capt. Fryatt, who commanded a British merchant steamer, was in March, 1916, attacked by a submarine without warning. He attempted to ram the submarine and forced it to submerge, thus saving his vessel from destruction and himself and crew from being murdered. About three months afterwards, while piloting a passenger vessel with a number of unfortunate Belgian refugees abroad, he was captured by German torpedo boats and taken to Bruges and tried by court-martial for attempting to destroy a German submarine several months before. A generous enemy applauds a brave act, a heroic deed, even if committed by a foe. But German kultur, so superior to the morals of the rest of the world, demanded the blood of this man, who, in order to save the lives of himself and crew, dared to resist the murderous attack of a German submarine. He was sentenced to death and immediately executed. A Dutch paper called this crime "a dastardly murder of spite and hatred."

The superiority of German kultur was even better illustrated in the murder of Miss Edith Cavell, an English nurse, who had in the hospitals nursed back to life again scores of wounded German soldiers. She assisted some wounded English and Belgian prisoners to escape. For this she was tried by a secret court-martial and sentenced to be executed. Brand Whitlock, the American minister, tried in every way in his power to save the life of this noble woman, but to no avail. She was taken to the place of execution and faced the firing squad. It is said that when this young woman faced that firing squad, hardened soldiers as they were, their hearts were touched with compassion. The order was given to fire, and when the smoke cleared away it was found that she was only slightly wounded, one bullet alone having touched her. But German kultur needed this sacrifice to carry out its high ideals, and the officer in charge of the execution, drawing his pistol, advanced upon the unfortunate woman and shot her through the head. About the same time across the English Channel, a German woman, a detected and self-confessed spy, who fearlessly and defiantly admitted her guilt and gloried in her deeds, was tried by an English court-martial. She was also convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in an English jail; yet the English woman, who had a hundred times risked her life in nursing back to health scores of sick and wounded German soldiers, was shot down like a dog.

The powers of Europe were not as blind to Germany's dream of universal conquest as German diplomats and strategists seem to think, but there were few who thought the blow would fall so soon. That Russia was alive to this situation is shown by the instant mobilization of her troops upon the Austrian and Serbian frontiers immediately after the ultimatum was sent to Serbia.

That France knew the extent of the German plan for world-wide control can not be doubted. Germany's attitude on many occasions, especially during the Moroccan embroglio, even going so far as to send a gunboat to Algiers, put France on notice. But none of these powers attached the importance to the plan it deserved. England alone appeared to be singularly blind to the extent of Germany's schemes of world aggrandizement. This is partly explained on the theory that England had for so many years regarded Russia as the enemy with which it would have to contend in the future that the plans of Germany, a much more formidable power, were overlooked. The ceding by England of the island of Heligoland to Germany in exchange for a free hand in Zanzibar will ever be regarded as one of the colossal blunders of history, though, strange to say, this treaty, while unfavorably regarded in England, was even more unpopular in Germany. But German diplomacy knew the strategic importance of this island. It was at once strongly fortified, and protects the mouth of the Kiel Canal, giving Germany two outlets to her fleet, each adequately protected, and in case of attack forcing England to divide her fleet. So important did the German Kaiser regard the acquisition of this island that he immediately went to the expense of doubling the width and extending the depth of the Kiel Canal, so as to allow easy passage of the largest superdreadnaught.

It is strange that the tremendous naval program of Germany did not put England on notice. So vast were these naval appropriations that up to 1907 Germany was spending $73 where England was spending $23. England, finally becoming alarmed at the rapid growth and development of the German Navy, proposed an agreement whereby each country would curtail the burdens of naval expenditure. This proposition was declined, and then England kept pace with Germany in naval preparation. At about the same time France became alarmed at the enormous preparations going on in Germany in reference to the huge land force and heavy armaments and entered a protest, which was of no avail.

The Kaiser and his advisers were now prepared to begin the campaign for world control. There had been firmly instilled in the German mind a contempt for other peoples and for all things not German. They were so saturated with the fulsome praises of self-adulation that they were convinced that no country could withstand the weight of German arms. They had built up the most effective war machine in the history of the world. They had developed every resource by intensive and scientific methods. Nothing was left to chance. Everything was prepared. Every strap was in its place, every buckle securely fastened. The huge Krupp works had supplied ample munitions of war. Tons of supplies were ready. Europe was asleep, Germany alone awake. The stage was set, the overture started, and only a signal was needed for the curtain to rise upon the greatest tragedy of all time.

Mr. Speaker, the German dream of world power had more the promise of its fulfillment than the casual observer would be led to believe. It was carefully planned after years of preparation, and only two incidents, unforeseen to Germany, prevented the Imperial Government from coming, at least for a time, into undisputed control of the greater part of Europe.

Criminologists tell us that in the plans, no matter how carefully laid, of the greatest and most intellectual criminals, there is always an unexpected weak place which often reveals the crime and betrays the criminal. So, also, in the gigantic plans of the Hohenzollern Kaiser there were two unexpected incidents which, occurring, defeated forever the ambitious dream of world power. One of these incidents was the unexpected resistance of Belgium, which gave the French Army time to mobilize, and the other was England's prompt entry into the war, which drove German commerce from the seas, thus cutting off all hope of obtaining supplies from abroad and at the same time making it possible for the allies to receive munitions and supplies from the markets of the world.

Germany's plan of universal control contemplated first striking in the East, where the colonial possessions of Great Britain and France were located. Either wresting these possessions from French and English control or else so disturbing conditions that possession of these colonies would prove a great weakness and source of uneasiness to both England and France was Germany's first objective.

In order to stir up troubles in the north of Africa so that the French and English possessions could be attacked with hope of success, it was necessary that a railroad from Berlin to Bagdad should be in operation so that troops could speedily and expeditiously be moved in close proximity to those points. The building of this railroad from Berlin to Bagdad would shorten the distance to India by at least 10 days. It would give Germany an opportunity to speedily mobilize her troops in close proximity to the Suez Canal. It would permit the Imperial Government, in case of war between Germany and Great Britain, to transport her troops by rail and attack Egypt from the land side.

Thus, the building and operating of this road from Berlin to Bagdad would, in case of war, permit Germany to speedily advance her troops against Africa, India, and the Suez Canal, and if trouble occurred with France, Morocco also could easily be attacked. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance to Germany's ambitious dreams of conquest in the East that this road be in operation and under German control. It was also invaluable to Germany as a commercial enterprise. The friendship of the Turk had been secured. There would be no difficulty in building and operating this road through the Turkish dominions on to Bagdad. The obstacle in the way was Serbia, the greatest and most important of all the Balkan States.

This railroad was a cherished plan of the Kaiser's. He had been working to secure it for many years. By condoning the horrible Armenian massacres and other inhuman atrocities where thousands of Christians, men, women, and little children, had been tortured and murdered by the Turks, and by playing for years upon the vanity of the Turkish people, the desired end had been obtained and Germany had firmly established friendly relations with the Ottoman Government.

The Kaiser had visited Jerusalem, and theatrically clothing himself in the picturesque costume of Lohengrin entered the city and in the presence of a great multitude embraced the Sultan, who in turn embraced the Kaiser, calling him the true successor of Frederick Barbarossa. With great ostentation, pomp, and display the Kaiser then proceeded to the tomb of Saladin, to whom he referred as "one of the most knightly monarchs of any kingdom."

In parting from Abdul Hamid the Kaiser assured the Ottoman ruler of the friendship of Germany in the following words:

Let the Sultan and 300,000,000 of Mohammedans throughout the world, who honor him as their spiritual chief, rest assured that at all times the German Emperor will be their friend.

The systematic flattery of the Turk, early began, continued. It was a part of the gigantic plan of universal control which an official report recited Germany had marked out "to the minutest detail." Bismarck stated that "the Turk was the only gentleman in the East." There is nothing, however, significant in this, for the murderer of men, women, and little children for no offense other than they were followers of the Savior of mankind would naturally appeal to one who advocated inflicting upon helpless, unarmed, nonresisting civilians "a maximum of suffering, leaving them only their eyes to weep with."

Roorbach, in a book which ran through over a hundred editions, wrote: "Between the German and the Turkish nature there is, if not a profound kinship, at least a certain degree of affinity." Not an affinity as strongly marked as the learned Roorbach thought, for it is related that on many occasions the murderer of Christians recoiled in horror at the dreadful tortures and cruelties inflicted in the name of German kultur upon the unarmed, nonresisting civilians of Serbia and Roumania. Before the war began, in 1914, German officers were sent to Turkey for the purpose of reorganizing and training the Turkish armies, and Germany offered to restore to the Sublime Porte a greater part of the Balkan territory which Serbia, Bulgaria, and Greece had wrested from the Ottoman Empire in recent wars.

The friendship of Turkey was assured. The railroad could be built from Constantinople to Bagdad or anywhere else in the Turkish dominion, but Germany still was powerless because Serbia, intensely antagonistic to both the dual monarchy and the imperial government, blocked the way.

When the heir to the Austrian throne was assassinated, owing to the ancient feeling of antagonism and hatred between Serbia and Austria, there was intense excitement prevailing in the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The opportunity to dismember or destroy Serbia was at hand. The minds of the Austrians already highly inflamed were easily influenced into a belief that the plot to murder the archduke was laid in Belgrade and that the Serbian Government was responsible for the abominable crime. Austria charged Serbia with complicity in this murder and sent to Serbia a 48-hour ultimatum to which no country could accede and retain a vestige of sovereignty. The feeling in Austro-Hungary against Serbia, the charge that Serbia was responsible for the assassination of Franz Ferdinand, and the creation of recent alliances among certain powers threatened the peace of the world and caused much uneasiness and concern to the diplomats of Europe.

France and Russia for mutual protection had entered into an alliance called the "dual alliance." Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy, for the same reasons, created the "triple alliance." England, France, Russia, Germany, and the dual monarchy all had agreed to respect the neutrality of Belgium. If Austria-Hungary attacked Serbia, the close affinity of blood and interest between Serbia and Russia would impel the great Russian Empire to rush to Serbia's assistance. Then Germany, the ally of Austria, would attack Russia, and France was the ally of Russia. The easiest way to invade France was to avoid the carefully defended mountain passes and enter by way of Belgium. In 1907 all of the great powers of Europe entered into solemn compact that no country should attack or invade Belgium or transport troops, supplies, or munitions of war across Belgian territory.

Thus, by events following the crime of Sarajevo, the peace of Europe was seriously endangered. But after several weeks had elapsed men's minds had cooled and it seemed to be generally understood that while Austria would make demands on Serbia in the nature of an ultimatum, yet these demands would be such that Serbia could comply, and Europe breathed again. It seems that Count Berchtold, the Austro-Hungarian premier, had assured the Russian ambassador that no extraordinary demands would be made upon Serbia, and the ambassador was absent on a brief vacation when the ultimatum was sent.

The ultimatum was evidently one Austria did not believe Serbia could accept, nor want Serbia to accept. It required that Serbia should repress every publication that intended to reflect upon Austria; to dissolve all the anti-Austro-Hungarian societies; to eliminate without delay all instructors and all educational matter which might serve to foment a propaganda against Austria-Hungary; and remove all officials from military and administrative service guilty of such propaganda, the names of which would be submitted by Austria later; to accept the collaboration of Austrian representatives to help enforce these demands; to permit Austrians to sit as a court in Serbia and participate in the judicial inquiry against the accessories to the plot to assassinate the crown prince and his wife; to arrest certain personages whose names were set forth in the ultimatum; to make public apology for the utterances of Serbian high officials, both at home and abroad, who, after the crime of the 28th of June, did not hesitate to express themselves in terms of hostility toward the Austro-Hungarian monarchy; and to inform the Imperial Government without delay of the carrying out of these measures. An answer was demanded in 48 hours.

Never was a more humiliating or insulting document sent from one civilized country to another. It was not expected that Serbia could comply with these demands.

It is contended and generally believed that Germany had knowledge of this ultimatum before it was sent to Serbia. That Germany approved the ultimatum can not be questioned, also that Germany was opposed to a further extension of the 48-hour limit is well established. Briggs Davenport, in his interesting history of the great war, which shows a remarkable familiarity with Balkan affairs, tells us that the text of the ultimatum was telegraphed to the Kaiser, who amended it in some particulars "in the direction of greater severity, so that the chance of evasion on the part of Serbia was minimized. It was he who fixed 48 hours the limit of time for the response." However this may be, Germany refused to join in with Russia, England, and France in requesting Austria to grant Serbia more time. The British ambassador telegraphed to Sir Edward Grey that "although I am not able to verify it, I have private information that the German ambassador knew the text of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia before it was dispatched, and telegraphed it to the German Emperor. I know from the German ambassador himself that he indorsed every line of it." Both the Russian ambassador and the Belgian minister at London, on the 28th day of July, expressed the opinion that Austria would never have sent such an ultimatum to Serbia without first showing it to Germany and having some agreement with that country.

The note to Serbia was dispatched at an unfortunate time, in so far as it concerned the powers who tried to preserve peace. The Russian ambassador had left Vienna on a brief vacation; the Serbian prime minister, Pachitsh, was absent from Belgrade; President Poincare, of France, and Rene Viviani, head of the ministry, were on the road returning from a visit to the Tsar. The Kaiser was away from Berlin, and could not be located for some time.

Serbia complied with practically all of the Austrian demands, save that which permitted Austrians to sit as a court in Serbia. Austria then invaded Serbia. Russia then declared war against Austria. On August 1 Germany declared war against Russia. On August 2 Germany sent an ultimatum demanding a right of way through Belgium into France, the day before war was declared against France. Belgium refused. The next day, August 3, Germany declared war against France, because some French aeroplanes had flown over the border, and began to advance on France through Belgium. On August 4 Germany declared war on Belgium.

Great Britain, Prussia, France, and Russia had jointly signed a document, afterwards referred to by the German chancellor as "a scrap of paper," guaranteeing to preserve the neutrality of Belgium. The fifth Hague convention declared in article 1 "that the territory of neutral powers is inviolable," and in article 2 that "belligerents are forbidden to move across the territory of a neutral power troops or convoys, either of munitions of war or of supplies," and, in article 5, that "a neutral power ought not to allow on its territory any of the acts referred to in articles 2 and 4."

When Great Britain saw that the neutrality of Belgium was violated England then declared war on Germany. The German troops attacked Liege, and the greatest war in the history of the world had begun.

Several years before the war the Germanic League in advocating universal empire issued a manifesto which in part declared that "progressive effort will be carried on until our batteries can be unmasked without danger. Europe will then find herself confronted by a situation already prepared even to the minutest detail and against which she will be powerless."

That the time to unmask these batteries was ripe was uppermost in the public mind of Germany. Maximilian Hardin, in a burst of fanatical war-crazed frenzy triumphantly wrote: "Not against our will and as a nation taken by surprise did we hurl ourselves into this gigantic venture. Our might shall create a new law in Europe." Mark now the prevailing German obsession of arrogance, self-superiority, and conceit. "It is Germany that strikes. When she shall have conquered new domains for her genius, then the priesthood of all the gods will praise the god of war."

With Germany's immense Army of 1,200,000 men, selected for the invasion of France and ready to move at a moment's notice, it was not believed in Berlin that Belgium would have the temerity to resist the demand of Germany that the German forces be given a right of entry through Belgium into France. But with a courage equal to that of her sons when Cæsar wrote that of all of Gaul the bravest were the Belgians, the little country bared her heroic bosom to the advance of a cruel and relentless invader, and though crushed down by a vast superiority of numbers, slowly and sullenly contested every inch of the ground. [Applause.] Five army corps at different points entered the little kingdom, but stubbornly fighting, her ranks decimated, her towns burned, her civilians murdered, Belgium paid for her temerity at the cost almost of her existence. She stands to-day "another Niobe of Nations, childless and almost crownless, in her voiceless woe" yet in its final analysis, to that little bleeding country belongs the first credit of preserving civilization to Christendom. [Applause.]

Slowly Belgium fell back before the heavy onslaught of the German millions, but in the meantime the French were mobilizing and getting ready to repel the invader. Every day that Belgium could keep the immense horde of Huns from French soil meant much to civilization. And when after over three weeks' resistance the German Army of five army corps had overrun Belgium and stood upon French soil the road to Paris was no longer open, for a French Army together with a detachment of English soldiers barred the way.

To Belgium belongs the real credit of stopping the German advance and ending forever the wild dream of world power which obsessed the German mind. Had Belgium permitted Germany to advance unmolested to the French frontier no French Army could possibly have been mobilized in time to effectively resist the savage advance of the ruthless invader. No English troops could have been landed. No battle of the Marne might have been fought, and the civilization and the Christianity of nearly 20 centuries might have been destroyed.

Looking back along the path civilization and human progress have slowly, painfully, and laboriously pursued, the student of history finds that from time to time great decisive battles have been fought, the result of which exerted a controlling influence in shaping the destinies, not alone of the various countries of the world as they slowly emerged from barbarism to semi-barbarism and then to the civilization of to-day, but also in shaping and directing throughout the centuries the course of civilization itself.

Had any one of these great battles terminated differently, the current of the world's history would have been changed and turned into other channels, which would have impeded and retarded the advancement of that progress which throughout the years has been purchased at the cost of so much blood and tears and sacrifice.

In the east first appeared the dawn of civilization, of man's awakening to the advantages of organization and cooperation in governmental affairs. Nearly 25 centuries before "the cross cast its shadow on Calvary's Hill" Hamarabi enacted his code, and cruel and unreasonable as some of the laws of Chaldea were, yet many statutes in this first code were remarkable indeed in the justice and the wisdom of their application.

Centuries after the decline of Chaldea, Persia showed evidences of progress, but, intoxicated with the excesses of many victories over weaker nations, it, too, declined into that state of despotism and selfish ambition which ever have found fertile soil in the east.

In fact, the civilization of those early days, while showing evidences of mechanical and architectural skill of a high order, yet for the most part portrayed no real progress toward the betterment of mankind and the uplifting of humanity in either a moral or a material advance, but rather a declination into a state of despotic absolutism, which, notwithstanding the barbaric splendor which marked the courts and retinues of its tyrannical rulers, served only to emphasize and accentuate the vices which civilization and progress had taught these rulers to employ.

From time to time the east endeavored to impress upon the young and virile west the effete, languorous, and despotic manners, customs, and habits which since the early morning of civilization down to the present period have in a more or less degree characterized that great section of the globe. Five hundred years before the birth of Christ Persia dominated all of Asia and, with an immense army, prepared to sweep over and subjugate Europe. Between the subjugation of Europe and the Persian Army was a little band of Athenians.

The hopes of the western world, "the intellectual treasures of the Greeks," the civilization of Athens, the liberal institutions of a free government which even in those early days marked the history of Greece and several centuries later was to be still more accentuated in the Republic of Rome, all depended upon Miltiades and his little army of Athenians as they bravely attacked the Persian hosts at Marathon. With a loss of less than 200 men the Persians were utterly routed, leaving thousands dead upon the field.

The free institutions of the western world were saved, and the longings, faintly apparent as they were, but still beginning to appear in men's bosoms, for independent and liberal government were permitted to find expression through centuries of political evolution without being hampered and strangled by the effete, despotic, and languorous influence of the East.

Not only was Europe saved from a demoralizing and despotic influence which would have retarded civilization and progress for centuries by the victory of Marathon, but the result of this battle made it possible, a century and a half later, for the refining influences of the Greeks to enlighten the darkness of the eastern world. The victory at Arbela gave Alexander mastery of the East and the culture, manners, customs, and even the language of the Greeks was as Arnold said:

> Planted from the shores of the Aegean to the banks of the Indus, from the Caspian and the great Hyrcanium Plain to the cataracts of the Nile, to exist actually for nearly a thousand years, and in their effects to endure forever.

[Applause.]

Asia failed to impress its institutions upon the advancing civilization of Europe. But another peril threatened the western world. One hundred and twenty-five years after Darius was defeated at Arbela, one of the greatest military geniuses of all time arose and Hannibal, with a mighty and almost invincible army of Carthagenians left Africa and invaded Italy. For nearly 16 years he was the terror of the western world, but at the battle of the Metaurus his brother, Hasdrubal, was completely overthrown. The power of Hannibal was broken, and the fall and destruction of Carthage opened wide the door through which Rome passed as the Imperial City gained the domination of the world. Cruel, relentless, savage, and barbarous as Roman rule was, yet its influence in the world's history was infinitely superior to that of Carthage. Asia and part of Africa even to-day are enriched by the legacies Roman occupation bequeathed, evidences of which, though faint and indistinct, are still visible.

The Romans worshipped many gods, but were true to none. An offense against the eagles was punished by death. An offense against the gods was a trivial matter. Unmatched in discipline, superior to all others in skill of arms, Rome exerted a firm control over all conquered provinces, collecting tribute with merciless avariciousness and insatiable greed, and punishing all attempts to throw off the Roman yoke with the utmost severity. As long as these provinces yielded their tribute and submitted to Roman authority they were protected against all the world and permitted to worship any God of their choosing.

Had the civilization of Europe been dominated by the mercenary despotism of Carthage or the extreme fanaticism which prevailed in Asia an attempt would have been made to destroy in its infancy the Christian religion. But Rome, more or less tolerant in religious matters, viewed with complacency and satirical scorn the early growth of Christianty, until its disciples became so numerous and the faith so firmly founded that the later efforts of Rome in persecuting the Christians proved unavailing to even diminish the constantly growing number of converts to a doctrine which for the first time opened the door of hope to the oppressed and the unfortunate of all mankind.

Christianity became firmly established in the western world. As the temporal power of Rome declined the star of empire advanced westward, but a new peril to the civilization and Christianity of Europe arose and again Asia attempted to wreck the advancement of human progress. A little over six centuries and a half after Roman arms defeated the Carthagenians at the Metaurus, a great horde of merciless, swarthy, ghastly appearing savages overran the east and south of Europe and, easily defeating the Roman armies which opposed them, crossed the Danube and, driving back the Germanic and Scandinavian forces, threatened to destroy the civilization and culture of Europe.

Tribe after tribe of these savage warriors poured into Europe, and before their grotesque appearance, the rapidity of their movements, the ferocity of their attack, and their legendary supernatural origin attributed, as Creasy suggests, "to the union of 'secret black and midnight hags' with the evil spirits of the wilderness." All Christendom stood aghast. Under the leadership of Attila, the scourge of God, this great swarm of Huns, fit prototypes of their more savage descendants, who have in recent years so ruthlessly and inhumanly ravaged and pillaged Serbia and Roumania, and their even still more brutal partners, who in the cruelty, wantonness, and bestiality of their crimes against defenseless Belgium, have far exceeded any atrocity Attila may have wrought, this great army of Huns prepared to conquer all of the western world.

Like a hot blast, scorching, shriveling, destroying, and driving everything before it, the savage and merciless progenitors of the present-day destroyers of Christianity, culture, and civilization swept on until the gates of Paris were almost in sight.

The barbaric horde was halted at Challons, on the Marne, where after a desperate battle the power of Attila was broken and he was driven back to his native east. It is indeed a significant fact and cumulative testimony to prove the assertion that history repeats itself when we recall that nearly fifteen hundred years afterwards, on the banks of that same little river Marne, another Christian army, battling for the peace and security of mankind, fighting for the democracy of the world, utterly defeated and routed another army of Huns more cruel and savage, more destructive against civilization, and more detrimental to human progress than were their untutored progenitors fourteen and a half centuries ago. [Applause.]

But Christianity was not permitted to survive without another great struggle to maintain its existence. The Moslems had crossed the Mediterranean, and, defeating the Visigoths, were in possession of Spain from Gilbraltar to the Pyrenees. They had conquered one after the other of the eastern Provinces of the decaying Roman Empire, and now a mighty army was prepared to invade Europe and force the inhabitants of the conquered countries to embrace Islam or the sword.

This was Europe's first invasion inspired largely by religious fanaticism. It was the crescent against the cross, Christianity against Mohammedanism. A magnificent army under the leadership of Abdeberrahman, the ablest and most renowned of the Moorish commanders, crossed the Pyrenees. It was an army of trained veterans, who fanatically believed that to fall in battle against the Christians would open the doors of Paradise, where the houris of heaven awaited their coming—an army which Southey described as—

A countless multitude; Syrian, Moor, Saracen, Greek renegade,
Persian, and Copt, and Tartar in one bond of erring faith conjoined—
Strong in the youth and heat of zeal, a dreadful brotherhood—

Who believed that—

Like the Orient, the subjected West
Should bow in reverence at Mohammed's name,
And pilgrims from remotest Arctic shores tread with religious feet
The burning sands of Araby and Mecca's stony soil.

Charles Martel met the invading Moslem Army and the followers of the Koran, who had robbed Rome of over half of its empire, conquered Persia, overrun Syria, Egypt, and north Africa, and had driven the Visigoths out of Spain, went down in crushing defeat before the Christian army at Tours, and thus the way was paved for Christianity to triumph throughout the world. In less than a century after the battle of Tours the power of the great Roman Empire was gone forever, but in its place there arose a power, spiritual in its nature and more far-reaching in its influence upon the history of mankind than ancient Rome in the height of its glory in even a remote degree attained.

The Norman conquest of England infused new blood in the sturdy Saxon stock. As Campbell expressed it, "They high-mettled the blood in our veins." The culture, graces, and refinements which characterized the fierce and arrogant chivalry of Normandy engrafted upon the rude but bold and honest Saxon character prompted Gibbon to write that "assuredly England was a gainer by the conquest," and Rapin, in his History of England, declared that the result of the Norman victory over Harold at Hastings was "the first step by which England is arrived to the height of grandeur and glory we behold in it at present."

Five hundred years later witnessed another struggle for supremacy. The victory of Drake over the Spanish Armada was world-wide in its consequences. Had the Spanish Armada accomplished its object the history not only of Europe but of the American Continent would have been changed, and new conditions would have arisen which would have altered the course of human affairs throughout the world.

The centuries rolled on. The rights of mankind were enlarging. The opportunities of the individual were widening. Autocratic governments were replaced by constitutional monarchies. Republics, receiving their authority from the consent of the governed, were established. Scientific progress and mechanical advancement were evidenced everywhere. The sciences and the arts were encouraged, education was free, agriculture was advanced, commerce was increased, law was enforced, order prevailed, humanity was expanding, courts of arbitration were instituted, international peace conferences were held, and the civilization, enlightenment, and prosperity of all Christendom had so progressed that a fond hope, shared by many, was born that the cruel and bloody wars of the past, brought about by man's greed and ambition for place and power, were the barbarous relics of a dark age from which the generations of today and to-morrow would be free.

But it seems that Christianity and civilization and human progress must not only be purchased at the cost of blood and tears and sacrifice, but the same price must be paid in order that they may be maintained and secured unto mankind. Nearly fifteen hundred years after the Huns were driven from the Marne another savage host was encamped upon the banks of that little stream. The civilization of the ages, the Christianity of nearly 20 centuries, and the culture and refinement of modern times was again trembling in the balance.

The old, old struggle was to be renewed. The setting of another sun would determine whether, as in the dim and misty past, once again might and brute force would take the place of right and justice; whether militarism would triumph over civil government; whether autocracy would usurp democracy; and whether governments whose responsibilities were devolved upon the individual and which derived all their powers and authority by the will and consent of the governed would be deemed a failure and perish from the face of the earth.

The Battle of the Marne can not be called one of the decisive battles of the world in the same sense that Arbela, Hastings, the destruction of the Spanish Armada, and Waterloo were decisive conflicts which once and for all terminated the power and strength of the adversary. More properly the comparison should be made with battles like Marathon, the Metaurus, Tours, and particularly Challons.

In these battles, while the advance of the invader was halted and the objective of the campaign lost, yet the defeated army was not destroyed, but reformed its broken line and for a time preserved a semblance of strength. At Marathon the Persian invader was driven back to his native East, but it was at Arbela that hope of Persia domination was lost forever.

The failure of Hasdrubal to join forces with his brother relieved Rome of any fear of Carthagenian rule in Europe, but for nearly four years after the Battle of Metaurus Hannibal remained in Italy, and it was some time afterwards when Scipio carried the war into Africa and Carthage was destroyed. The defeat of the Saracens at Tours drove them back across the Pyrenees, but it was seven and a half centuries later when Ferdinand and Isabella expelled the Moslem warriors from Europe.

At Challons Attila was defeated, but he retired in good order and even renewed his attacks against Europe, but the dread of the Hun as a world power was gone. On the other hand, the result of the Battle of Hastings left England at the mercy of Duke William, who at once proceeded to parcel out her fairest lands to his devoted adherents. Drake's defeat of Spain was decisive. The Spanish Navy was destroyed, her colonists were unprotected, and in one decisive conflict all dread of Spanish dominion vanished. The defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo ended the ambitious dream of the greatest military genius the world has ever known. Like a flaming meteor blazing across the skies, the son of a Corsican lawyer overran Europe, changing almost at will the map of a continent and placing the members of his family upon the thrones of the various countries conquered. But Waterloo came and the purple-clad Emperor of the Tuilleries spent the remaining years of his life a lonely prisoner at St. Helena.

The defeat at the Marne by no means destroyed Germany's power as an active fighting force, but it did destroy the carefully laid plan to take Europe unawares. Germany's dream of world power could be realized only by taking Europe by surprise, by a sudden dash across Belgium into France and overrunning the country before an army to repel the invader could be mobilized. All Germany's plans were working toward this end, and the defeat at the Marne gave the rest of Europe a chance to breathe, as it were, and to gather together an army which, with the aid of the United States, has dissipated forever the German dream of world dominion. [Applause.]

Had the Germans been victorious at the Marne, the next day they would have been knocking at the gates of Paris. Holland also would have soon been overrun, and controlling the shores of the English Channel, England would have had no port to disembark her troops nor any base to land her supplies. With France, Belgium, and Holland in German hands, and England unable to land either men or supplies, no new army sufficient to successfully cope with the invader could be mobilized, and the Hohenzollern dream of world power might have been, for at least a time, realized to the full.

The result of the battle of the Marne thrilled all Christendom. It put new hope into the heart of France. It put life and courage into the despairing soldiers of Belgium whose loved ones had been murdered, whose hearthstones were desolate, and whose fields were blackened wastes. It stimulated recruiting in England. It destroyed the fear that perhaps Europe might have been taken too much by surprise to resist the invader. It demonstrated that the French and English troops were more than a match for Germany's wonderful war machine. It created in the German mind a bewildering surprise that other soldiers could fight on equal terms with theirs.

As the German soldiers were fleeing from the banks of the Marne for the first time there crept into their power-crazed minds a suspicion that German superiority in all things was not as complete as all true Germans had been taught to believe. Had not the learned professors, the eminent scientists, the erudite economists, the preachers, the Kaiser, and his advisers all assured them that they were a superior race of men and under the direct personal care and guidance of God?

They were prepared to encounter obstacles which they expected to soon sweep away, but the possibility of a defeat never entered their minds. They were somewhat amazed, puzzled, and extremely angered at the stubbornness and effectiveness of the unexpected Belgian resistance, yet by force of numbers they steadily and relentlessly pushed the Belgians back and were satisfied in the belief that by their superiority in all things German "genius was still president." After the Germans had accomplished their objective, in so far as Belgium was concerned, and stood on French soil, they accepted, as a matter of course, the French and English retreat, as the Huns pressed on toward Paris. They were but fulfilling their destiny, which was to rule over the other peoples of the earth. Their superiority and their kultur had been and was being demonstrated. Their fighting machine was invincible. Flushed with the intoxication of their own success, enriched by the plunder which they had seized from the terror-stricken inhabitants of the conquered towns, drunk with the excesses of rapine and murder inflicted upon the helpless and unfortunate Belgians, and thrilled with eager anticipations of an early sack of the gayest capital in Europe and the rich promise of rapine and plunder it afforded, the Germans confidently pressed on. The French and English stubbornly and in excellent order fell back. The eager Germans followed. Paris drew nearer and nearer. The seat of government was transferred to Bordeaux, and still the French and English retreated, and still the victorious Germans pressed on.

"Surely the French and English will give battle to-morrow" was the prayer of Christendom, but the setting of the morrow's sun witnessed another retreat of the allies, another advance of the invader, until Paris was only 20 miles away.

On the banks of the Marne, where nearly fifteen hundred years before the savage horde of Huns had been driven from France, Joffre, the lion-hearted leader of the French, drew up his troops in line of battle. He had perfected his plans, he had outgeneraled von Kluck, he had mobilized his entire strength, and the "dre de retraiter" had been changed to "l'ordre d'avancer."

Again history repeated itself, for the setting sun of another day witnessed the spectacle of another army of savage Huns fleeing in more disorder and terror than did their barbaric progenitors over fourteen hundred years ago.

The people of the United States did not wish to enter this world-wide war, and were willing to make any sacrifice short of the surrender of national honor to keep from being drawn into the conflict. At the same time, however, there was a fixed determination firmly established in the minds of the American people that all protection guaranteed by international law should be secured to the citizens of the United States while in the discharge of all duties pertaining to their legitimate business.

Upon the beginning of the great European war the United States immediately assumed a position of strict neutrality. The proclamation of President Wilson to this effect was expected, and it at once met with the universal approval of the American people.

The Monroe doctrine, guaranteeing the territorial sovereignty of our sister Republics in South and Central America from foreign aggression, always a principle of the utmost importance, not alone to the United States but to all countries in the western continent, had recently, by way of emphasis, been reaffirmed by the United States both in 1899 and 1907 at The Hague conventions.

Next in importance to the Monroe doctrine has been that principle, first laid down by Washington and universally practiced by his successors, whenever it was possible so to do, of avoiding all embarrassing and entangling alliances or mixing in the quarrels of our European neighbors. For us to intervene in a European quarrel would be an invitation to them to violate both the letter and the spirit of the Monroe doctrine.

It was in accordance with this time-honored principle, as well as an earnest desire that our country be spared the horrors of war, that postponed for many days the inevitable conflict with Germany, and it was only after repeatedly submitting to many outrages that the United States reluctantly entered the war.

From the very beginning of hostilities so many vexatious and perplexing problems were continually arising that it taxed to the utmost the wisdom and ingenuity as well as the patience and tact of President Wilson.

With far-seeing sagacity President Wilson adhered to a strict observance of the principles of international law. It was the rock upon which he stood in an earnest endeavor to keep the privations and horrors of war from his country. Once let this rock be shattered and all would be chaos and confusion, and we would at once have been led into a maze of uncertainty and doubt. The only safe policy to pursue was to be guided by those precedents and statutes which from time immemorial have been laid down and agreed to by the civilized nations of the world as the proper course and policy for a neutral nation to pursue in dealing with a belligerent nation.

The wisdom of such a course is apparent to the most casual observer. Before the United States entered the war all the vexatious and perplexing problems which arose were not confined to disputes between our Government and the Imperial Government of Germany.

At the time when the controversy over submarine warfare between the United States and Germany became acute, we were also engaged in a controversy with Great Britain over the shipping of cotton to neutral ports. We were at the same time engaged in controversies with France and with Italy over the holding up and refusing to deliver cablegrams which related solely to commercial transactions between our citizens and the citizens of the neutral countries. All of these questions had to be settled, and the only proper way to settle them was by the precedents of international law.

The only wise course, the only safe course, the only proper course was not to deviate from these precedents. If once a single right of an American citizen were surrendered to Germany, then why not surrender another to Great Britain, another to France, and still another to Italy, and so on ad infinitum until all precedents were destroyed. Then every controversy which arose between the United States and a neutral nation would have to be settled either by force of arms or else through the means of a new diplomacy and a new code of international law—a code based upon expediency, with no precedents behind it for guidance and no sanction of approval from any country to give it weight. Each new question would then depend upon either the finesse of diplomacy or the force of arms as to its ultimate conclusion.

A vexatious problem, more troublesome at home than abroad, however, arose out of the selling of munitions of war to the belligerent nations.

The many friends of Germany in this country resented this, and they, together with others, demanded an embargo upon the shipment of all munitions. The munition makers of the United States were willing to ship these supplies to Germany if they could be safely delivered, but England's blockade prevented this.

The right of a neutral nation to sell munitions of war to a belligerent nation has long been sanctioned by custom and approved by international law. The United States, in 1793, speaking through the mouth of Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, declared:

Our citizens have always been free to make, vend, and export arms; it is the constant occupation and livelihood of many of them. To suppress their calling—the only means perhaps of their subsistence—because a war exists in a foreign and distant country in which we have no concern would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice.

And in accordance with this principle munitions of war were sold by American manufacturers to French agents over the protest of England. Notwithstanding this protest, England, a few years afterwards, through Mr. Canning, officially declared—that the shipment of arms to belligerents was not against the law, and that it could not be prohibited at all by the English Government.

In 1796, through the Attorney General, the United States reaffirmed the position of Thomas Jefferson in 1793, and in 1842 Secretary of State Daniel Webster, in a controversy between the United States and Mexico, declared that—

Trade in articles contraband of war is carried on at the risk of those engaged in it under the liabilities and penalties prescribed by the law of nations or particular treaties. If it be true, therefore, that citizens of the United States have been engaged in commerce by which Texas, an enemy of Mexico, has been supplied with arms and munitions of war, the Government of the United States nevertheless was not bound to prevent it, could not have prevented it without a manifest departure from the principles of neutrality, and is in no wise answerable for the consequences.

Franklin Pierce, in a message to Congress in 1855, reaffirmed this principle, as did President Grant in 1870, at the beginning of the Franco-Prussian War.

During the Civil War Prussia sold munitions of war to both the United States Government and to the Government of the Confederate States. Germany sold munitions to Spain in the Spanish-American War, as well as to Russia in the Crimean War; to both Russia and Japan in the Russo-Japanese War; to the Boers in the war with England; and to the various Balkan States in recent wars.

The right of a neutral country to sell munitions of war to a belligerent nation is based upon common sense and sound public policy. The best energies of every country in times of profound peace, while not neglecting proper and adequate means of national defense, should be devoted to the education of children, the development of agriculture, the establishment of new industries, the increasing of commerce, and the encouragement of all kinds of legitimate business. All the energies of a country should not be devoted to the making and storing of vast supplies of war munitions to the detriment of everything else. If the laws of nations forbade the purchase of war munitions by belligerents from neutrals not only would it interfere with the legitimate industries of the neutral countries, but what is far more serious, the richest nation, or that nation which concentrated all of its energies and its resources in the manufacturing and storing of vast quantities of war supplies, would be at much advantage over and a constant menace to its more peaceful neighbors.

It would also force these neighbors to curtail the appropriations for education and the encouraging and developing of agriculture and commerce and devote all their energies to manufacturing munitions, which policy, if pursued by all, would keep the world perpetually in a state of unrest, would make taxes oppressive, and the country would always be on a war basis. Then again, if the United States refused to sell munitions of war to neutrals, in case we got into a war we would ourselves be estopped from buying munitions from a neutral country.

Our country was well within its rights, both as to international law and common sense, when Congress refused to put an embargo upon the selling and exporting of munitions of war. We said to the belligerent nations:

We are manufacturing war munitions; we will sell them to you, but we will not deliver them; come to our shores and get them if you want them and are willing to pay for them.

This invitation included the central powers as well as the entente, but there was practically no way for Germany to secure them, as the English fleet controlled the seas. However, Germany did buy munitions from the United States. The German submarine Deutschland, returning to Europe after its wonderful trip to the United States, carried with it over $1,000,000 worth of war munitions.

From the very beginning of this European struggle it was feared that if the United States should be drawn into this conflict it would be because of some act or acts committed on the high seas. When the neutrality of Belgium was violated England at once declared war against Germany. The first official act of the United Kingdom was to proclaim a blockade against the commerce of Germany. England's blockade was as strictly in conformity with the principles of international law as modern conditions would permit. It was a visible blockade of actual ships patrolling the waters. These ships could not venture within 3 miles of the shore, because the invention of large-caliber guns with a range of 10 or more miles would destroy them. This blockade was effective, ships were captured in endeavoring to circumvent it, but these vessels were not sunk nor were the passengers and crew murdered. Nor were they even attacked without warning, but notice to surrender was given in every instance. The vessels were captured, towed to a friendly or neutral port, and the cargo, if contraband, seized and confiscated.

In many instances England unlawfully seized our cotton and our vessels. The Government of the United States protested, and it was left to a court of admiralty to decide whether the seizures were unlawful or not. Before the United States declared a state of war existed between our country and Germany, Great Britain had in every instance paid the American owners of the cotton seized and restored the vessels.

The blockade England maintained was a lawful blockade and not one with vessels sailing beneath the waters and striking without warning. England's blockade sank no vessels, nor did it destroy the lives of the passengers and crew. Both Great Britain and Germany mined the North Sea in violation of the international agreements of The Hague. The United States protested against these violations, but did not declare war against either country on account of them. It was charged against England that some of these English mines were floating. This England stoutly denied, contending that the location of every mine was definitely known, and any English mine which was floating was one which had broken loose and was drifting. England further offered to safely pilot any vessel not carrying contraband articles through the waters which were mined.

Germany's answer to England's blockade was a merciless submarine warfare against the commerce of the allies. Notwithstanding international law provided in the capture of belligerent vessels the due observance of making this capture with every reasonable regard to the life of the crew, the security of the cargo, and the safe conveying of the prize to a port of entry for adjudication, and the protection of the captured from all injury as far as possible, German submarines violated all of these provisions and struck without warning, condemning ship and passenger, crew and cargo to destruction. While this course could be viewed only with the utmost disfavor by all the civilized countries of the world, yet it was never dreamed that the German submarine warfare would be conducted against neutral vessels and passenger boats and great ocean liners carrying hundreds of passengers who owed allegiance to the flags of countries not at war with Germany.

When the news was flashed to America that the great floating palace, the Lusitania, with over 2,000 souls on board, had been struck without warning and that many of the passengers and crew had perished, a thrill of horror and indignation over this barbarous act was felt from one end of the United States to the other, which indignation was tremendously increased when it was learned that of the 1,000 men, women, and little children who perished 137 were Americans.

Our relations with Germany at that time were already strained. About six weeks before, the British passenger ship Falaba was sunk and an American citizen lost his life. About the same time the American steamer Cushing was attacked by airships, and a few days afterwards the American steamer Gulflight was attacked by submarines. The destruction of the Lusitania and the murder of 137 Americans brought forth a vigorous protest from the United States. It seemed as though the countries were on the verge of war, but Germany assured the Government of the United States that American ships would not be hindered in the prosecution of legitimate shipping, and the lives of American citizens on neutral vessels would not be placed in jeopardy. The Government of the United States relied on this promise, but the barbarous and ruthless warfare continued.

Out of this warfare sprang the famous McLemore resolution, to notify all American citizens that if they traveled in armed merchant belligerent vessels and were injured or murdered upon the high seas, they traveled at their own peril, and the United States would not hold any country to account for such murder.

The adoption of this resolution would have been a shameful confession of the inability of the United States to protect the lives and property of its own citizens. It would have justly held us up to the contempt of all civilization as a Nation unwilling to protect its own people from assassination by a foreign power. Travel is a necessary part of a nation's business, and because other nations were at war to ask our people to stop traveling, to stop looking after their own business, to lose their means of livelihood, and keep away from the great ocean highways, which since the beginning of time have been free and open to the world, was intolerable and unendurable.

Notwithstanding the solemn assurance of Germany, more Americans were murdered and our Government again protested. Germany again recognized the protest, and in December, 1915, promised the Government of the United States "that liners will not be sunk by our submarines without warning and without safety of the lives of the noncombatants, provided that liners do not try to escape or offer resistance."

But in the next 60 days four or five more ships were sunk, and an American consul, traveling to his post, and nearly 400 American citizens were drowned. Still the United States forebore to go to war, and again protested to the German Government and again Germany promised to accord safety to the passengers and crew before sinking the vessel.

Again Germany defaulted and our Government threatened to sever diplomatic relations. Then Germany agreed to sink no vessels except in accordance with the general principles of visit and search, and that full opportunity would be given for all Americans to escape.

On January 31, 1917, however, Germany notified the United States that from and after February 1 she would forcibly prevent all navigation, including vessels of both belligerents and neutrals, in a zone around Great Britain, France, and Italy, and that all sea traffic would be stopped or the vessels sunk without warning.

Such a notification, after all the German promises, came to us like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. As the Secretary of State, in a recent speech, said, "It needed but the words reported to have been uttered by the German chancellor to complete the picture of the character of his Government when he announced that the only reason why the intensified submarine campaign was delayed until February last was that sufficient submarines could not be built before that time to make the attacks on commerce efficient." Do you realize that this means the promises to refrain from brutal submarine warfare which Germany had made to the United States were never intended to be kept; that they were only made in order to gain time to build more submarines; and that when the time came to act, the German promises were unhesitatingly torn to pieces like other "scraps of paper"?

This notice of Germany that all belligerent and neutral vessels would be sunk without warning whether they carried contraband or not, whether they were loaded with cargoes or not, whether they were passenger vessels or not, was nothing more nor less than an official declaration of piracy upon the high seas.

It is said that way back in the dim and misty past, when primitive men, sleeping in trees and dens and caves, would meet one of their own kind who did not belong to their immediate family and who they had, perhaps, never before seen, that no questions would be asked, no quarter would be given, but, with lowered head and bared fangs, they would silently, ferociously hurl themselves one upon the other and, with fist and tooth and foot and nail, fight it out to the last. If this be true, if mankind in the early morning of human existence was on so low a plane and men fought at random like the beasts of the forest, then it may well be said that the call of the wild has harked back for hundreds of centuries, and now, after nearly 2,000 years of Christianity, finds its expression in the ruthless German submarine warfare, where, silently, stealthily, and in the nighttime, neutral and stranger vessels are set upon and all on board are murdered without even the murderer knowing or caring who his victims may be.

Even then the United States did not declare war against Germany—even then, after all these insults and outrages and denial of a right to travel the high seas. No nation has the right to exercise jurisdiction over ocean waters over 3 miles from the land, yet Germany attempted to syndicate over 2,000,000 leagues of ocean highway and attempted to monopolize to her own use all the paths of ocean traffic. Time and time again the American flag had been insulted, American property had been wantonly destroyed, and American citizens had been brutally and ruthlessly murdered. Three times had the United States made official protests which Germany apparently respected, and then, after complete preparation had been made, treacherously and falsely repudiated. Even then the United States did not go to war. All that was done was to hand the German ambassador his passports and sever diplomatic relations with a Government whose official actions showed that it could not be trusted to keep a promise and who construed its solemn treaty obligations according to Bismarck's doctrine, that "where the power of Prussia is concerned I know no law."

The pages of all history may well be challenged to show a parallel to the patience and forbearance of the United States to continued insult, murder, and outrage. Once diplomatic relations between the Governments of the United States and Germany were severed, the President knew, every citizen knew, that if more American vessels were destroyed and more American citizens were murdered, for us to have submitted further would not only have placed our country in a humiliating attitude before all the world, but would have also meant the surrender of those inalienable rights and privileges which from time immemorial have been guaranteed to every country by the laws of nations. Such a surrender would have at once caused the United States to lose its prestige among the nations of the earth and inevitably sink to the level of a second or third rate power.

So eager was the United States to keep from being drawn into this conflict which seemed to convulse all Christendom, and so anxious was President Wilson to spare our country the horrors of war, that in order to postpone our entry into the struggle and to at least save the lives of American citizens from being wantonly destroyed and American vessels from being sunk to the bottom of the sea, the President earnestly requested Congress to grant permission to the owners of American merchantmen to place defensive arms upon their vessels, in the hope that these vessels could be defended from the murderous attack of the German submarines, which, like so many snakes, struck their venomous fangs at everything which crossed their path.

The House of Representatives promptly gave this permission, but to the astonishment and chagrin of the American people this permission was refused by the Senate, not because the Senate of the United States was opposed to an American citizen arming himself against a murderous and unlawful attack from a foreign foe, but because of the peculiar rules of practice and procedure in that body, which gave a Senator the right to speak for an indefinite period upon any subject. The resolution was sent to the Senate in the closing hours of the Sixty-fourth Congress, which session would end and the life of that Congress would expire at noon on March 4, 1917.

A filibuster was inaugurated by a few Senators against the resolution. Debate continued until the hour of adjournment arrived, a vote upon the resolution was prevented, the filibuster was successful, and the Sixty-fourth Congress expired without the resolution ever having been acted upon by the Senate.

Thus was presented to the American people the remarkable spectacle of American Senators refusing to give permission to an American citizen to put a gun upon an American vessel, carrying an American flag, laden with American products, destined to friendly ports, sailing in waters which from time immemorial had been open to the navigation of the world and which the owner of this vessel had every right, human and divine, to traverse; these American Senators refused to permit the American owner of an American vessel to carry arms in order to give him a chance to defend the ship and cargo and protect the lives of the passengers and crew against a piratical, unlawful, cruel, and murderous assault.

While the result of the filibuster destroyed all hope of peace and had the effect of hastening the conflict with Germany, yet war with Germany was inevitable, and the United States did not enter the conflict a moment too soon. Good finally resulted from the Senate filibuster, for an enraged public opinion soon forced that august body to adopt a much-needed cloture reform, but the adjournment of the Sixty-fourth Congress without the passage of the armed-neutrality bill awoke the American people to the seriousness of the situation which confronted them, and, standing as one man behind President Wilson, they determinedly and grimly began to reconcile themselves to the idea that an honorable peace was impossible.

The forbearance and patience of the American people in dealing with the insults and outrages Germany perpetrated upon us was apparently boundless. On several occasions for far less serious causes our country has resorted to arms.

Up to the beginning of the nineteenth century the young Republic paid the pirates of northern Africa a tribute for the privilege of sailing the Mediterranean Sea. In 1793 Algiers seized 11 American vessels and 112 of the passengers and crews were captured and sold into slavery; and even before that time two American vessels had been captured by these same pirates.

The infant Republic began the construction of a Navy, but in the meantime, while we were constructing and building the Constitution, the President, the United States, the Chesapeake, the Congress, and the Constellation, we paid the Dey of Algiers a million dollars in money and presents, together with an annual tribute of $27,000, so that American vessels might be permitted to trade in Mediterranean ports.

Again, in 1796, the United States was forced to pay Algiers another million dollars, while the Pasha of Tripoli received $83,000 in money and presents for this same purpose. Nor was this all, for two other avaricious pirates—the rulers of Tunis and Morocco—also demanded and received tribute from the young Republic which had so recently taken its place among the nations of the earth.

Paying tribute for the privilege of exercising an inalienable right was intolerable to those who believed in the principles of liberty, equality, and free government, and when these avaricious pirates who infested the Mediterranean demanded more money and seized another American vessel, though the people of the United States numbered less than 6,000,000 souls, they declared that no more tribute would be paid. In 1803, during Jefferson's administration, under the leadership of the gallant and gifted Decatur, the war was again carried into Africa. The United States was completely successful in every instance, and over a hundred years ago American sailors bought with their blood the freedom of the Mediterranean Sea. [Applause.]

In 1812 England interfered with our commerce and, refusing to recognize American naturalization laws, took sailors off of our ships and impressed them into English service. The young Republic, with a population of less than 10,000,000, was not afraid to vindicate American honor and demand that American rights must be respected. Not for one moment did the United States hesitate, not for an instant did she falter, though England only interfered with our commerce and impressed our seamen. She did not sink our ships nor murder our sailors. Notwithstanding England was the greatest maritime country in the world, we went to war and on land and sea gained a glorious victory.

Over a century ago the infant Republic, with a population of less than 10,000,000 people, arose and settled forever the right of the American flag to wave in every port and on every sea. [Applause.] Now, when we have grown into the mightiest Republic on the face of the earth, Germany told us we must surrender the rights and liberties our fathers bought with their blood and maintained for over a hundred years. Germany told us that if we dared to sail the seven seas except in a certain course laid out by the Imperial Government, a few ships only each month, bound for one or two selected and unimportant ports, painted, as has often been said, "like a barber's pole," we did so at our peril.

Germany told the United States: "We are the elect of God, the salt of the earth. Our Kaiser tells us the trident is ours to wield; we will syndicate to our own use 6,000,000 square miles of ocean travel. Your jurisdiction over ocean waters is fixed by international law at only 3 miles from your shores." "German horizons stretch far away." (Kaiser.) "We intend to monopolize to our own use all the highways of ocean traffic, tie up your ships, suspend your commerce, and let your seamen and sailors seek other employment. We will throw a Chinese wall around the United States. Set but a foot beyond that wall and dare to venture from your shores and we will sink your vessels and murder your sailors."

If there be any who believe that we should have submitted to the continued outrages and insults of Germany, to the repeated violations of all precedents of international law, to the persistent breaking of all the rules and customs of humanity, and to numberless cowardly assassinations and murders of our citizens—if there be any who believe that we should have further submitted, let them pause for a moment and recall the heroic deeds of their fathers, who, under Decatur at Tripoli, Perry at Lake Erie, and Jackson at New Orleans, declared for all time America's right to maintain and defend the freedom of the seas. [Applause.]

The United States, as well as the entire Western Continent, was included in the gigantic plan of world control. Two years before the beginning of the war in Europe Germany made secret proposals to Great Britain to join forces, attack Mexico, and destroy forever the Monroe doctrine.

Gerhart von Schulze-Gaevernitz, professor of political economy in the University of Freiburg, wrote, in 1908:

> We need a fleet capable not only of coping with the miserable forces of South American States, but powerful enough, if the need should arise, to cause Americans to think twice before making any attempt to apply an economic Monroe doctrine in South America.

The celebrated journalist and author, Wintzer, years before the war, wrote:

> European interests, and with them the German, lie in America in case we have the power to support them effectively.

Eight years before the war Klaus Wagner wrote:

> Not only North America, but the whole of America must become a bulwark of German kultur.

And, referring to South America, he wrote:

> The lands will be settled upon by people of Germanic blood, the non-Germanic inhabitants being driven into reservations or at best to Africa (Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, Egypt).

Recites one of the Pan-Germanic works published in 1911, in referring to south Brazil and Uruguay:

> It is truly a miracle that the German people did not long ago resolve on seizing the country. * * * False modesty has no value in a struggle for world empire.

The German people referred to, however, are German settlers in those countries. This same publication contends that it would be a blessing to the South American Republics if they came under German control—

> They would soon reconcile themselves to German rule and take delight in the fame of the German name in the world.

Gustav von Schmollor, the most distinguished historian of Germany, advocated the colonization of millions of Germans in Brazil.

The hatred Germany bears toward the United States is especially exemplified in the teachings of the professors in the universities in Germany. This propaganda of hate, jealousy, and envy directed against the United States in the different schools and universities produced a widespread impression upon the German mind.

The Monroe doctrine, maintaining the territorial sovereignty of our sister South and Central American Republics, is especially obnoxious to the Germans, and many of their bitterest tirades and most venomous philippics are directed against it.

Johannes Vollert wrote in 1903, in the Alldeutsche Blatter, about the Monroe doctrine:

> We Europeans almost universally consider it an impertinence. With a noisy cry they try to make an impression on the world and succeed especially with the stupid. The inviolability of the American soil is invoked without there being at hand the slightest means of warding off the attack of a respectable European power.

Hettner, professor of geography at the University of Heidelberg, declared in 1915 that—

> Just because the United States has set up the Monroe doctrine to exclude Europeans from America it does not follow that we should acquiesce in that doctrine.

Prof. Unold, of Handelshochschule at Munich, spitefully wrote nearly 20 years ago that the English and Yankees are everywhere disliked, and he prayed for the day to come when the Germans would be the intellectual, economic, and political leaders of the South American people.

Said Maj. Liebster, of the German Army, to an American vice consul before the two countries were at war:

> We are keeping books on you Americans. It's a long account and we haven't missed any details. Rest assured that that account will be presented to you some day for settlement. * * * We are keeping the account in black and white * * * with customary German thoroughness.

Edelsheim, of the German General Staff, wrote in 1901, over 12 years before the war, that a German corps—> can begin operations on American soil within at least four weeks. * * * As a matter of fact, Germany is the only great power which is in a position to conquer the United States. * * * To accomplish this end the invader would have to inflict real material damage by injuring the whole country * * *, to seize in a short time many of these important and rich cities, to interrupt their means of supply, disorganize all governmental affairs, assume control of all useful buildings, confiscate all war and transport supplies, and, lastly, to impose heavy indemnities.

It is strange that that power-crazed maniac serving on the general staff of the German Army, dreaming over a decade ago of the conquest of the United States, did not add to his category of dire penalties and punishments inflicted upon us by the conquering Germans, after the looting of our cities and seizure of our public buildings, and—> murder their helpless old men, torture and mutilate their little children, and violate their gentlewomen, as we always do in an invaded territory.

The close personal friend of the Kaiser and military attaché, Goetzen, remarked to an American major, N. A. Bailey, about 20 years ago:

> About 15 years from now my country will start her great war.

He was only five or six years off in his calculations. He continued:

> She will be in Paris in about two months after the commencement of hostilities. * * * Everything will move like clockwork; we will be prepared and others will not be prepared. * * * Some months after we finish our work in Europe we will take New York and probably Washington and hold them for some time. We will put your country in its place in reference to Germany. We do not purpose to take any of your territory, but we do intend to take a billion or more dollars from New York and other places. The Monroe doctrine will be taken charge of by us, as we will then have put you in your place.

Germany's plan was to take Europe by surprise, and then the humiliation of the United States was the next step in the gigantic venture. Jealous of our growing commercial supremacy, the Kaiser cast his covetous eyes across the Atlantic, and in his mad dream of world-wide power the vision of rich America paying Germany's enormous expenses of the war would come to his mind. We are a peace-loving, liberty-seeking people. We have always been more or less opposed to any large Military Establishment, and knowing how utterly unprepared we were at the commencement of the Great European war, the humiliation and conquest of the United States doubtless seemed an easy matter to the ambition-crazed Kaiser, once he had succeeded in subduing and terrorizing all of Europe.

The conqueror dictates the terms of the peace treaty. In his dreams William of Hohenzollern could see a German chancellor, as Bismarck once did in Paris, pounding the green tables in London, in Paris, in Rome, in Petrograd, until the ink bottles danced, as he demanded huge indemnities and the fleets of the conquered belligerents. A victorious Germany, with all Europe lying bleeding and prostrate at its feet, the navies of the conquered countries at Germany's disposal, would have naturally bent all its energies in attempting to destroy that country whose ideals, civilization, and republican form of government were a menace to the militarism and autocracy of Imperial Germany.

Germany's denial of our right to sail the seas, the propaganda of hate so industriously distributed throughout the Empire, her proud boasting that some day she would conquer our country, and the actual plotting of our destruction, both here and in Germany, were not the only grievances the United States had against the Imperial Government.

Long before trouble with Germany began our country was overrun with German spies. German agents blew up our railroad bridges. They destroyed our factories. They wrecked our munition plants. They industriously circulated false and scurrilous propaganda in a vain attempt to stir up strife and create bad feeling between us and our sister South and Central American Republics.

Two years before the war they plotted with Great Britain to join forces, invade Mexico, and destroy the Monroe doctrine. They tried to involve us in a war with Japan. While our country was at peace with all the world German officials here in the United States, protected by that cloak international law throws around an envoy and makes his person sacred and inviolable—protected by this custom, German officials, taking advantage of their position and the opportunities it afforded to acquire information, intrigued and plotted against us, and secretly tried to bribe Mexico to attack us, offering. with the aid of German arms, to convert the States of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona into Mexican Provinces. Our flag had been insulted in a hundred ways. Our people had been murdered upon the high seas. No country ever had perpetrated upon it more insults and outrages before resorting to arms. No country ever submitted to injury and insult with more patience and forbearance; but when the United States did enter this conflict no country ever lifted its sword in a nobler cause, nor with a more fixed and steady determination to leave nothing undone to expeditiously and successfully terminate the war.

THE HUN'S MISTAKE.

Ambassador Gerard, in his book entitled "My Four Years in Germany," tells us that on the occasion of a visit he made to the house of the German chancellor that:

I remember on one evening—

Said he—

I was asked the question as to what America could do, supposing the almost impossible, that America should resent the recommencement of ruthless submarine warfare by the Germans and declare war. I said that nearly all of the great inventions used in this war had been made by Americans; that the very submarine which formed the basis of our discussion was an American invention, and so were the barbed wire and the aeroplane, the ironclad, the telephone and the telegraph, so necessary to trench warfare; that even that method of warfare had been first developed on something of the present scale in our Civil War; and that I believed that, if forced to it, American genius could produce some invention which might have a decisive effect in this war. My German auditors seemed inclined to believe that there was something in my contentions. But, they said, "While possibly you might invent something in America, while possibly you will furnish money and supplies to the allies, you have no men, and the public sentiment of your country is such that you will not be able to raise an army large enough to make any impression." I said that possibly if hostilities once broke out with the Germans the Germans might force us by commission of such acts as had aroused England to pass a law for universal military service. This proposition of mine was branded by the Germans as absolutely impossible, and therefore I am sure that the adoption by the United States of universal service in the first round of the war struck a very severe blow at the morale of Germany.

The unprepared condition of the United States from a military standpoint before the beginning of the great European war has been a matter of much comment and, in view of later events, has excited much hostile criticism, most of which was undeserved.

There were several good reasons which appealed to the American people why the United States did not embark upon a plan looking to a large Military Establishment.

Before August, 1914, it was not uncommon to hear the opinion freely expressed that the days of great wars were practically over. Indeed, there were many who believed that the Russo-Japanese War marked the last great struggle between the major powers of the world.

"Even if there should be another great war between the powers," it was argued, "it will affect us only in a remote degree." The isolation of the United States; its separation from Europe by 4,000 miles of ocean; its settled policy of refusing to interfere or mix in any way into the quarrels of foreign countries; its careful avoidance of any foreign entanglements; its great wealth; and the commercial relations existing between the citizens of the United States and those of foreign countries all gave to the people of the United States a feeling of security. It was not believed that in the future military operations on a large scale would be conducted on the land. The continued inventions of new and improved rapid-firing small arms; machine guns discharging nearly a thousand shells a minute; heavy artillery effective for miles; chemical experiments resulting in the manufacture of new and deadly explosives; together with the skill and marksmanship which accompanied the use of both the small gun and the heavy artillery were good and sufficient reasons in the minds of many why no more great land battles would be fought. Before such destructive armament it was not believed that armies could confront each other in the field without speedy and complete annihilation.

Deeply rooted in the hearts and minds of the American people was the distrust of a large standing army and, believing that all battles of the future would be fought upon the sea, support of the Army was reluctantly extended by Congress and any material increase in the Military Establishment at once met with speedy and determined opposition. An army sufficiently large to quell insurrections and police our island possessions seemed to be the extent to which the American Congress was willing to go. While the Army of the United States was negligible in so far as numerical strength is concerned it was argued that the National Guard of the various States would be the nucleus upon which a volunteer force would form in case the necessity for a larger Army should ever arise.

The success of American arms in the past had been brought about by volunteers, and there was prevailing an idea, incredible as it may seem now, that in the event of danger confronting our country, almost in a day millions of volunteers would be ready and prepared to meet and overcome that danger whatever it might be. No one doubted then, no one doubts now, that in case America needed her sons for her defense they would rush to her rescue. He who doubts the courage and bravery of the American people is no true American.

The spirit of our Revolutionary fathers, who resolved to be free or fill a martyr's grave, finds lodgment in the breasts of our people to-day. Since that memorable Fourth of July nearly a century and a half ago, when "Equality, with sword uplifted above the cradle of an infant Republic," consecrated that sword to the imperishable doctrine that "freedom is the heritage of mankind," our country has been foremost among the nations of the earth. The blood of the patriot who fell at Bunker Hill, which flowed at New Orleans, which drenched the plains of Buena Vista, and which ran in rivers at Gettysburg is no more red than that which courses through the veins of her sons today as they carry the Stars and Stripes to victory in Europe.

There has always been patriotism enough, there has always been bravery enough, there has always been heroism enough, and there has always been sacrifice enough. But armies can not be trained and equipped in a day. A state of war has now existed between the United States and Germany for over a year. The pages of history fail to show as much accomplishment in the same length of time along all lines of military preparation as has been made by the United States. But it is only now that we are ready to present an imposing force to halt the Hunnish invader in his attempted ravishment of France.

While the standing Army of the United States was inconsiderable in point of numbers before the beginning of the great war in Europe, it must not be presumed that the Navy was proportionately weak. On the contrary, the Navy of the United States, with the exception of Great Britain, compared favorably with the navy of any other country in the world. Some of the closest students and most accurate authorities placed the American Navy second in rank, acknowledging only the fleet of the United Kingdom as superior in armament and number of vessels. The Navy Yearbook, however, placed the United States Navy fourth, stating that both the navies of Germany and France were superior in tonnage, in armament, and in fighting strength to ours.

This statement in the Navy Yearbook was vehemently denied by many authorities, which denials, whether sustained or not, tended to prove that at least the Navy of the United States was a considerable fighting force and that there was little difference between its strength and the strength of the navies of other great powers excepting England.

The Navy of the United States in the number of its heavily armored battleships was slightly superior to that of Germany and considerably heavier than that of France, but our Navy was not as well balanced as it should have been. Auxiliaries were lacking, the number of cruisers was deficient, and the smaller craft, so necessary to the success of naval operations, was wanting. It was perhaps for these reasons that the naval authorities in the Navy Yearbook placed the United States fourth in rank.

There was no reason why these auxiliaries should not have been furnished and our Navy "rounded out." It was not because of a lack of pride Congress took in the American Navy. It is true that Congress was divided into two groups, one group calling itself "big-Navy men" and the other calling itself "little-Navy men"; but rare, indeed, could be found a Member of the American Congress who was not proud of the Navy and hoped that it would become stronger and more powerful.

The names of these two groups in which Congress was divided were misnomers, because the struggle between them was a fight relating almost solely to battleships. In fact, the "little-Navy men" were continually clamoring for submarines and more vessels of the smaller type, while the "big-Navy men" were continuing to use all their energies in order to induce Congress to build dreadnaughts of the heaviest class.

The advocates of both schools of thought expended most of their force and nearly all of their arguments for and against the building of more large battleships. The "little-Navy men" contended that a program of one ship of the dreadnaught class each year was sufficient progress, which contention was vehemently challenged by the opposition. So acrimonius did these discussions often become and so anxious were the advocates of either side to carry out their respective views on the battleship program that in the violence and heat of the discussion the smaller craft were often overlooked.

Whether the American Navy was second, third, or fourth at the beginning of the European war is a disputed question, but there was no question as to what rank the officers and sailors of American vessels occupied. As for efficiency, discipline, morale, and marksmanship, the American sailor was second to none. The results of the marksmanship tests of the different nations is not public property, but there was a confident belief shared by the officers and men as well as the Members of Congress that American gunners upon American battleships are the most expert marksmen in the world. Color to this opinion is lent when it is known that in order to improve the marksmanship of the American gunner many thousands of dollars more were expended in the purchase of ammunition for target practice in the American Navy than by any other country of the world, not even excepting Great Britain with her gigantic fleet.

Unfortunate as it was that the military preparation of the United States was so incomplete at the beginning of the great conflagration in Europe, yet the reasons why our country did not earlier enter upon the establishment of a more complete military organization are apparent. The desire for peace which seemed so universal and which found its expression in the donation of peace prizes, the organization of peace societies, and in conventions at The Hague participated in by all the civilized countries of the world, together with the fixed policy of the United States in attending to its own business and refusing to be drawn into European quarrels, caused the American people to regard the possibility of a war with a European power as remote indeed.

The distance from here to Europe, the great expense any country would incur in attempting to land troops or supplies, the recent reaffirmance at The Hague by the United States of the Monroe doctrine, and its ready acquiescence without protest or objection by any of the great powers, the general tendency to submit all disputes and international differences to arbitration, the tremendous financial and material resources of the United States which could be utilized in case of war, the enormous sums necessary to keep up a standing army, the deep-rooted aversion the American people have always held toward the creation of a large military establishment, and, above all, the progress humanity and civilization had made toward higher, nobler, and better things during nearly 20 centuries of Christianity, prompted the American people to rest content with a navy increasing in strength and power, already sufficient to preserve the Monroe doctrine and defend our coast line, and an Army, small though it was, yet together with the National Guard strong enough to preserve the peace of the Western Continent and police our island possessions.

The House of Representatives is the greatest deliberative body in the world. It possesses as much independent thought and independent action as any other representative body on the face of the earth. Fresh from the people every two years, a new Congress springs into existence. It is more or less responsive to the will of the people. It is more or less obedient to the wishes of the people, and while it possesses as much independent thought as any other representative body in the world, yet no general policy is ever continued indefinitely against the wishes of the people, and certainly no policy like refusing to enter upon the creation of a stupendous and gigantic plan of military preparation for national defense could be carried on for years without the acquiescence, the approval, and the indorsement of a great majority of the American people.

Few outside of the German Empire ever dreamed that a world-wide conflagration was at hand, and that almost overnight, as President Wilson once said, "the world would be on fire and the sparks would be flying everywhere."

After nearly 2,000 years of Christianity, civilization, and progress, who ever dreamed that our country would soon be forced into the greatest war of all the ages, and that less than 12 months after our entry into the struggle, unprepared as we were, we would have raised in money alone over twenty times the amount of the then existing national indebtedness, and that we would have loaned to our allies over six times the amount of this national debt.

That within the 12 months' time we would have so increased the fighting strength of our Navy that even the Navy Year Book will now place us second among the powers of the earth, and that we would have over 2,000,000 trained soldiers in arms, and that hundreds of thousands of as brave men as ever offered their lives for their country's cause were already fighting on European soil.

Had one gifted with prophecy foretold five years ago that the world would soon be meeting in a shock of conflict participated in by 33 great countries, including our own, and that this war was unparalleled in the number of men engaged and countries involved, in the cruelty and ferocity of the conflict, in the use of new and improved weapons of a type and with a caliber larger and more deadly than it was thought the ingenuity of man could devise, and that great armies composed of millions of men would confront each other year after year, had such a prophecy been made the prophet would have been laughed to scorn, his prophecy unheeded, and a jury de lunatico enquirendo sitting on his case would have adjudged so false and so sensational a prophecy absurd and the prophet himself a fit subject for an insane asylum.

Yet for over four years, on land and on sea, in the air and beneath the waters, in the trenches and on the plains, at long distance and in close proximity, the young and vigorous manhood of the universe have been at each other's throats, grappling in a death struggle; fighting with armored tanks, huge reptilian-appearing machines, suggestive of the mammals of a prehistoric age; fighting with improved rapid-firing guns, which under favorable conditions would enable half a dozen men to soon wipe out a regiment; fighting with the hand grenade discarded over a hundred years ago; fighting with guns belching forth liquid fire which scorches and burns and shrivels up the opposing force; fighting with noxious and poisonous gases, which not only kill but destroy the sight and the brain of their victims; fighting with tooth and nail, with bare hands and clubbed muskets; fighting with all kinds of deadly weapons and destructive implements of ancient as well as modern warfare, and deciding many engagements, in the face of all of science's wonderful inventions, at the point of the bayonet, like our fathers did over a century ago.

Immediately after the entry of the United States into the war, perhaps the bitterest and most intense discussion precipitated in the American Congress for many years arose as to how our Army should be raised and what means should be employed in securing an armed force sufficient to comport with the needs of the United States in the conflict in which our Government had become involved.

The majority of the Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill looking to the volunteer system, while an adverse report was prepared by the minority members of the committee reflecting upon the volunteer system as inequitable, unstable, inefficient, and unfair, and demanding a system by selective draft in which each State should furnish its quota of soldiers in proportion to its population.

It was contended by the advocates of the volunteer system that usage, precedent, and custom condemned the draft; that the armies of the past, which had so immortalized the glory of American arms, were composed of volunteers; that the draft as applied to the Civil War was found to be a failure and proved to be unsatisfactory to both the United and the Confederate States; that a selective-draft system which selected only a certain class of our citizens to the exclusion of other classes was unconstitutional, and that the adoption of such a policy would create riots and make the war so unpopular that the strength and usefulness of the United States would be greatly impaired.

The conscript was ridiculed, the name was declared one of reproach, some going so far as to say that the words "conscript" and "convict" were synonymous. It was contended that the conscript was not a suitable person to carry the American flag in battle, that the man who refused to volunteer and was forced to fight would be worse than useless, and that battles could be won only by volunteers who were eager to respond to the call and who were ready to make any sacrifice for the sake of their country.

There were many ingenious, honest, and sincere arguments made in Congress against the selective-draft system. But after the selective system by an overwhelming majority became a law, for the most part with not enough exceptions to prove the rule, the opponents of the selective-draft plan loyally supported the system adopted and did all in their power to make the plan a success. The advocates of the selective draft were not only largely in the majority but they had much the better of the argument, for surely no more fair, equitable, and democratic method of selecting an army can be devised than the present draft system.

It was vehemently and conclusively argued by the advocates of the selective draft that the volunteer system was inadequate, inequitable, unjust, and unfair; that the highest duty a citizen owed to his country was to bear arms in its defense; that a government owed its existence only to the fact that it extended to its citizens protection in their lives, in their liberties, and in their property. In return for this protection the citizen owes to his government his property and even his life if necessary. That a government owes to itself the paramount duty of first securing its preservation, and in efforts to do this the energies, the time, the ability, the property, and the life of the citizen can be commandeered to accomplish this end.

That men do not volunteer simply because of an adventurous spirit and a desire to become a soldier but from higher motives; because of a sense of duty impelling them to make any sacrifice for their country. That the man who volunteered might want to stay at home as much as the slacker who refused to answer the call to the colors, but that his love of country, his pride in its institutions, and his belief that his services were needed compelled him to make the sacrifice. That the volunteer system was not only unfair and inequitable but it was unscientific as well, for it brought men to the ranks who had dependents looking to them for support, and, again, it interfered with the business of the Nation by accepting men who were worth more to the country in other lines of endeavor and who could not well be spared from business important to the carrying on of the war.

That the unfairness and inequities and inequalities of the system were often shown by all the members of one family volunteering while their neighbors with less responsibilities shirked their duty and became slackers. That a selective-draft system, forcing all alike to respond to the colors, and proclaimed to the world long before it became effective would be robbed of the odium created by the conscription laws of the past, because those laws were resorted to only after the volunteers had become depleted and exhausted. That the laws of the past calling for volunteers had been unsatisfactory because of their indefiniteness and uncertainty of obtaining recruits. That the selective-draft system would close the doors on the hiring of substitutes and the payment of bounties. It was denied that custom and precedent were opposed to the draft.

Congressman KAHN, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, read a letter from Washington to James McHenry, in March, 1782, which recited:

> It is idle at this later period of the war, when enthusiasm is cooled, if not done away, when the minds of that class of men who are proper subjects for soldiers are poisoned by the high bounties which have been given and the knowledge of the distresses of the Army so generally diffused through every State, to suppose that our battalions can be completed by voluntary enlistment. The attempt is vain, and we are only deceiving ourselves and injuring the cause by making the experiment. There is no other effectual method to get men suddenly but that of classing the people and compelling each class to furnish a recruit.

He further read from a message of Thomas Jefferson, in December, 1805, which is as follows:

> In the meantime you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace as well as of war so to organize or class the militia as would enable us on any sudden emergency to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upward of 300,000 able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 26 years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense or defense in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service can not but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I can not, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it when necessary an efficient corps fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.

At the conclusion of this spirited, and in some degree acrimonius, debate a vote of the House was taken, the result of which recorded 313 Representatives voting for the selective-draft system and 109 Representatives opposing the draft, supported the committee report, and voted for the volunteer system.

Since man first took his place above the beasts of the forest, ambition to lead, to command, was born in the human heart. Prehistoric man, living in dens and caves, fought for his mate, fought for his food, and often with bare hands fought with the beasts for the preservation of his life.

Little removed from the savage animals with whom he so often contended for his very existence, he gradually rose above his environment, while the beasts to-day are as fierce and as untamed as their ancestors were in the dawn of the world's history. The tiger still springs upon his victim with the same ferocity which characterized his brutal progenitor 10,000 years ago. The grazing flocks and lowing herds are now filling the same sphere of usefulness they did centuries past when David tended them on the banks of the Jordan. But shaking off the shackles of his early surroundings, man, step by step, advanced until he soon became master of the world.

Gregarious instinct first brought men together in families. It was but a step from the family organization to the grouping of families, and thus tribes were formed. Then came the leaders, men who were in a more or less degree by nature fitted to command. Leaders were first self-appointed because they were stronger than their fellows. They held their leadership by brute force, for many longed but few dared to contest the honor of command, which honor was surrendered only when the strength to maintain it was gone. Survival of the fittest was the rule, but men became more advanced, and leaders, drunk with authority and eager for power, began to see the advantage of patronage, of drawing men to them, not only through fear and through affection but also through their interest. Thus, by force, by daring, through admiration, and by a rude system of patronage, leaders began to be strong enough to hand the leadership down to their sons, and royal lines sprang into existence.

The continuance of power is intoxicating, it breeds arrogance and conceit, and it was not unnatural that all the homage and deference shown to a royal heir should finally create in his mind a belief that he is the anointed of the Lord and his right to govern comes from on High. His followers, ignorant and deluded, soon began to share the same opinion. The divine right of Kings became an established fact. Militarism was triumphant, and autocracy was the rule. But the world continued to advance, and in the progress of "ascending humanity" year by year, century by century, there crept into men's hearts a longing for freedom, a desire for a more widened opportunity and a form of government which should receive its powers from the people who were to be governed.

Here in America the patriot's dream of all the ages became a living reality. Here in a new world the door of hope, of freedom, of opportunity for all mankind was opened wide, and through it came the oppressed of other nations seeking an asylum of refuge for themselves and their children from religious and political persecution.

Here in a new world there was demonstrated for all time a complete manifestation of man's capacity for self-government. The spectacle of a free Republic, dedicated to liberty and equality, its responsibilities devolving alone upon the will and by the consent of the people themselves was seen across the waters, and the influence of the vigorous young American Republic was felt in every court in Europe.

Autocratic authority rapidly declined. Limited monarchies took their place, and, with the exception of Germany, Russia, and Austria, the example of the young Republic of the West in sharing the responsibilities of government with the governed was followed by all the great powers. It seemed as though at last, after years of despotism, that liberty, freedom, equality, and opportunity would be extended alike to all mankind.

In England and in France the divine right of kings had perished with the Stuart and the Bourbon; but still military despotism and autocratic rule cast its withering blight over a part of Europe, and it was only in the twentieth century that fate decreed that this monstrous doctrine should not survive the fading fortunes of the Hohenzollerns. [Applause.]

From time to time great military geniuses have arisen who by their force, their intellect, their power, and their ambition have attempted the enslavement of mankind—Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, Attila, Gengis Kahn, Napoleon, and others. Looking back now for some evidences of their despotic influence, we are amazed to find how puny and contemptible their efforts, actuated solely by the hope of personal aggrandizement, now seem. The fame they acquired has long since been eclipsed and overshadowed by the memory of the sorrow and misery and suffering they left behind.

To-day a power-crazed military despot, fondly imagining that he is a fit prototype of the great military conquerors of the past, sits at Berlin and, dreaming of world empire, proudly boasts that where "Alexander, Cæsar, Theodoric II, Frederick the Great, and Napoleon failed" he will succeed. But above the roaring of cannon, the screaming of shells, the clashing of sabers, the whispering of bullets, the groans of the dying, the shrieks of the wounded, and the wailing of the widows and orphans this military autocrat can now hear the beating of the waves as they dash upon the lonely shores of another St. Helena. [Applause.]

But blood will flow and men will die and women will suffer as blood flowed and men died and women suffered whenever tyrants have attempted to enslave mankind.

Militarism and autocracy could not perish from the earth without a struggle which would convulse all Christendom. The rights of mankind, the liberties of the people, free government, justice, equality have all been dearly bought. Throughout the centuries we look back and we are appalled at the price our fathers paid that we might be free and that these blessings could be secured unto us. They bought and paid for every one of them, and always in the same coin—the coin of blood and tears and sacrifice. Not a right do we possess to-day, not an advantage do we have, not an opportunity do we own but in the past some arm strove and some heart bled for its attainment.

It has immutably been decreed by Him who doeth all things well that no great advantage can come to the human race except at the cost of sacrifice and suffering.

The spectacle of Christians, men, women, and little children, torn and mangled by wild beasts, their bodies rent and racked by cruel irons, crucified head downward, plunged in boiling oil, tortured in a thousand ways and dying a million deaths, firm and steadfast in the faith of the Lord, this spectacle did more to convert the heathen and Christianize the world than all the preachings in the universe.

Why it was God's plan that the gentle teachings of the Prince of Peace could not be impressed upon the world without being accompanied by sorrow and tears and suffering and death we know not; we can not answer the question the poet asks:

Why did Christ come sorrowing
And not to a glad refrain,
Why was the world's redemption scheme
Born in sorrow and in pain?
Why is the heart of motherhood
By the hand of an infant torn,
And why must a nation travail
That some great truth be born?

The militarism of the past, the autocracy of the ages, are making their last stand. They will perish utterly from the face of the earth, but before they go all Christendom will travail and suffer. For the Germans to win, for the Huns to triumph and destroy the democracy and the civilization and the Christianity of twenty centuries, would be to reverse the history of mankind. [Applause.]

From the beginning of time human progress has gone forward. It has never receded, never gone backward. The Huns, with the torch of the incendiary in one hand and the dagger of the assassin in the other, may overrun Belgium and devastate part of France. They may murder old men, violate gentle women, torture little children, and shock the universe with the enormity and the bestiality of their crimes. They may have a temporary success, but powerful, savage, cruel, and relentless as they are, the merciless horde of Huns now vainly striving for the conquest of the universe and wearing themselves out in attempting the destruction of the world's democracy can no more stop the sure, steady, continual advance of "ascending humanity" toward a broader culture and a loftier civilization than they can retard the seasons' march throughout the calendar years. [Applause.]

From each great upheaval in the affairs of men throughout the past, though often misery and suffering were left behind, yet from each one of these cataclysms history tells us that the world's moral, social, political, and economic atmosphere was the purer for the disturbance.

It was early decreed that some time the final struggle between autocracy and democracy, between military despotism and civil government, would be determined; and where is he to-day who is bold enough to declare that the present time is not the time, of all others, for this mighty struggle to take place? The baneful influences of despotism were too powerfully entrenched to be destroyed without a conflict which in its consequences would convulse a universe. This conflict was inevitable; and where is he who will declare that it did not come at the right time? Suppose this great struggle had been postponed for a quarter of a century, would our children have been better prepared to meet the iron host of Prussian millions than are we to-day?

Twenty-five years more of military training and military preparedness in Germany while other nations, half asleep, were preaching the doctrine of peace on earth and good will to men.

Twenty-five years more of propaganda of hate, of contempt for other nations and of all things not German.

Twenty-five years more of feverish activity in the Krupp works, of the storing of munitions of war, and in perfecting the marvelous war machine before which for a while all Christendom stood aghast.

Twenty-five years more of sermons and lectures and speeches on kultur in Germany; Germany with its immensely increasing birth rate, its chemical development, its mechanical improvement, and its intensive farming system.

Twenty-five years more of labor agitation and labor troubles in England, which if permitted to increase would create the worst kind of social discontent, paralyze industry, cripple commerce, retard development, and sap the economic lifeblood of the nation.

Twenty-five years more of constantly decreasing birth rate in France, which already was a matter of uneasiness and concern to all thoughtful minds in the French Republic.

Twenty-five years more of concentration of wealth, of extravagant speculation, of mad scrambling after dollars, of development of great trusts and combines, of destruction of competition in the United States, which already in its consequences presaged a decay of patriotism, and was a growing menace to the democratic principles of a republican form of government.

Who shall say that this great conflict should have been postponed for another quarter of a century? Let it come now while the world is awake and prepared to hurl back the audacious invader. [Applause.]

Let no one doubt the outcome of this great struggle. Let no one fear that the bright sunlight of the world's increasing democracy will ever be darkened by he shadow of the sable wings of the Prussian eagle. The blood of millions of martyrs, which throughout all time has been freely shed so that the door of opportunity should be open to mankind has not been spilled in vain. By their sacrifices and their suffering and their trials this door has been opened wide, and there are not enough blood and steel and iron in Germany to close it. [Applause.]

Every day the allies become stronger and stronger. Every day means that the United States is nearer the hour when she will strike with all her force. German militarism, Prussian despotism, kultur, autocracy, and all that is hateful and repugnant to those who love human liberty will be destroyed. The allies, against tremendous odds, in men, and in preparations for war, have excited the admiration of the world by their heroic resistance to the mailed fist and armed heel of Germany. But now, fresh, eager for the conflict, ready to die so that men may be free, millions of young Americans are rushing to France.

For nearly two and a half years we kept out of this struggle, and it was only after repeatedly submitting to many outrages and indignities that war was forced upon us. We did not enter this war for the love of conquest. The sons of America are not fighting in the trenches of France for the hope of territorial expansion. We are waging no war for the aggrandizement of our country. We entered this war to preserve the eternal principles of free government. We entered this war to protect our honor and to defend our homes and our firesides. We entered this war to maintain the freedom of the seas and to do our part in the great struggle, in which civilization and democracy are now engaged, so that the inalienable rights of mankind, dear to the hearts of all lovers of human liberty do not perish forever from the face of the earth.

Because our people have always loved peace and because we were far behind the nations of Europe in military preparations, the German Kaiser treated the protests of the United States against Germany's unlawful acts, with contumely and contempt. He never dreamed that if war between the United States and Germany did occur we would send soldiers to France. He thought it would be years before an American Army could be mobilized, trained, and ready to go, and even then, if he had not succeeded in vanquishing Europe by that time, the murderous U-boats would see to it that our soldiers never reached French soil. All that he believed we could do or would be able to do would be to lend our allies money and send them supplies.

Despite the thousands of German spies in the United States, little did the Kaiser know of the genius, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the American people. The unexpected resistance of Belgium and England's prompt entry in the war dissipated forever the mad dream of a world-wide German Empire. But the entry of the young Giant of the West into this war means that not only is the Hohenzollern dream of world power gone forever, but that the end of Prussian militarism and Prussian autocracy is at hand. [Applause.]

The greatest material resources of any country in the world's history are behind Pershing and his men as they carry the American flag into the trenches of Europe.

Less than 18 months ago the entire bonded indebtedness of the United States, including $222,000,000 Panama Canal bonds and $150,000,000 authorized for the use of the Navy was less than $1,500,000,000. To-day we have authorized the issuance of $14,000,000,000 in bonds, of which $7,000,000,000 was to be loaned to our allies, over $6,000,000,000 of which has already been turned over to them. In addition to this, there has been over $4,000,000,000 raised by taxation, and the House of Representatives on yesterday passed without a dissenting vote a revenue bill which will raise an additional $8,000,000,000.

At the close of the Civil War, in 1865, the United States had a bonded indebtedness of $2,381,000,000, which was the largest bonded debt the United States has ever owed in its entire history up to 1917. The wealth of the United States in 1870 was estimated at $30,068,518,000, the population at that time was 38,558,371, which was a per capita wealth of $779.83.

In 1904 the estimated wealth of the United States was $107,104,211,917, with an estimated population of about 81,000,000, which was a per capita wealth of about $1,300.

The wealth of the United States in 1912 was estimated at $187,739,071,090, with a population of over 92,000,000, which was a per capita wealth of over $2,000, an increase since 1904 of about $700 per capita in the national wealth.

During the eight years prior to 1912 the wealth of the United States was, notwithstanding the panic of 1907, increased about 75 per cent, or about 9 per cent per annum, over 1904. During the last six years there has been a period of unprecedented prosperity in all sections of the United States, and therefore the percentage of increase in the Nation's wealth has been marked. Estimating this increase under normal conditions at only 9 per cent per annum, we find that the wealth of the United States would be over $250,000,000,000, which is a per capita wealth of considerably over $2,500. In addition to this there is to-day in the United States more than one-third of all the gold in the world.

These figures are reassuring and show that as enormous as have been our expenditures since our entry in the European war, yet our resources have scarcely been disturbed and the payment into the Treasury of the United States since July 1, 1917, of $2,775,000,000 income and excess-profits taxes never caused the fluctuation of a single stock or bond nor created a ripple on the surface of commercial affairs. Yet the amount recently paid in the Federal Treasury in income and excess-profits taxes alone for 1917 exceed by over a quarter of a billion dollars the amount of the greatest total bonded indebtedness in the history of this Government antecedent to the present war.

The American people are in dead earnest about this war, and the best of our young and vigorous manhood now composes the Army of 4,000,000 men who will fight for democracy in the old world. Already comes back the news of the bravery and daring and efficiency of the American soldier. [Applause.] A soldier who has never known a defeat, and whose deeds of valor, whose acts of courage, and whose achievements along all the lines which go to make the soldier and the man will be sung in legendary songs around the firesides of Europe for generations to come. [Applause.]

In vain Ludendorff and the Crown Prince hurled their hundreds of thousands of picked troops against the little army of Americans at Sergy, at Cantigny, at Belleau Wood, and at Chateau Thierry. In vain the German soldiers, with a courage worthy of a nobler cause, charged again and again that stone wall of Pershing's like billows rushing against a rock-bound coast, only to be hurled back, broken and crushed, into the sea. [Applause.]

In the dark days of the April drive, where the exhausted line of our gallant allies, overpowered, outnumbered, giving way before the iron host of German millions, were pressed back toward Paris, that little army of Americans, small in numbers though they were, stood firm and steadfast. For days, for weeks, for months, they met the red storm of German fire and blood and steel without ever surrendering one foot of ground; and then, when the order to advance was given, like bridegrooms stepping to a marriage feast, the victorious Americans pressed on until the proud Prussians Imperial Guard, Germany's wonderful war machine of over a century's building, unable to meet the withering effects of the American fire, melted away before that deadly hail of shot and shell like snow beneath a southern sun. [Applause.]

We will carry this war through to a successful conclusion. The skies of the Fatherland will be darkened with the clouds of American aeroplanes. Millions more, if necessary, of as brave soldiers as ever offered their lives for their country's cause will face the German Kaiser's guns, while the mighty bosom of the ocean will be dotted here and there with countless American vessels carrying supplies and munitions to our men and our allies and driving the murderous German submarines from the waters of the sea.

We have now, thank God, a united country. Geographical but not sectional lines mark the only divisions in the United States, and the only rivalry between the sons of those who over 50 years ago wore those colors which suggested "the gray of the early morning and the blue of the noonday sky" is a rivalry to see which can first place the American flag on the ramparts of a German trench. [Applause.]

Over 100,000,000 of united American people, with heads uncovered, eyes uplifted, and hearts overflowing, stand in reverence beneath that flag which proudly floats above the mightiest Republic on the face of the earth. And as Old Glory unfurls its folds to the breezes of heaven, throwing aloft those stars and stripes which represent the liberty, the freedom, the independence, and the democracy of all mankind, from North and South, from East and West there goes up from the American people a mighty chorus, ever swelling, louder and louder, until the very clouds its echoes would repeat—a chorus of—

America, our country, we answer thy call,
That freedom may live and that tyrants may fall.
We owe thee our all and our all shall we give;
We'll do and we'll die that America may live.

[Long and loud applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a message to the American people delivered by the President on Labor Day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a message from the President of the United States to the people of America on Labor Day. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if my memory serves me right, that address has heretofore been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the Clerk that it has not been, and I made search myself and failed to find it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I recall having seen it inserted by some Member.

Mr. EVANS. I offered it, but it was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to having it inserted in the RECORD, but I do not care to have it inserted a second time.

Mr. EVANS. I think the gentleman is correct about that. I am advised, however, that it has not been printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the time being I shall object, until I can satisfy my memory in respect to the matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the progress of the United States in the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the progress of the United States in the war. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and clearing of the Speaker's desk, I be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes in order to present to the House a new gun.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the clearing of the business on the Speaker's desk, he be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman from Connecticut would couple with his request one that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] may have 30 minutes, so as to save time this afternoon.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that request has been granted.

Mr. LEVER. No; it was not granted, and I ask to modify the request in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Connecticut accept the modification?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly; the gentleman from Wisconsin to follow me.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this morning I asked for 30 minutes for the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, and also 30 minutes for the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR. I would like now to include 30 minutes for the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], whether ample time will be afforded during the remainder of the day to take up the food-conservation bill and get through with it before 5 o'clock on Monday?

Mr. LEVER. I should think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair then understands the request is also modified to include the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the clearing of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes, at the expiration of which the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes, after which time the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 4723, an omnibus pension bill, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The bill has been on the Speaker's table for two or three months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk Senate bill 4723, an omnibus pension bill, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give any explanation of the anomalous condition of an omnibus pension bill having slept on the Speaker's table for more than two months?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. For the reason that some of the Senate conferees were out of the city and some of the House conferees had been out of the city, and we could not get a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12714, the general Agricultural appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to two hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and one-half hour by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that that order has already been made. The order was made yesterday that there be two hours of general debate; that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] control 1 hour and 30 minutes of that time, and the gentleman from South Carolina 30 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I think the Chair is correct about that. I will ask the Chair to submit my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. SISSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12714) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if possible, every citizen of the United States should visit Europe. He will return a better American. I do not mean by this statement to belittle the great nations and peoples over there. England, France, and Italy are mighty States, peopled by splendid men and women. They are our partial and loyal friends. They are brave and interesting. Theirs is a land of achievement and enchantment, a land of brilliant history. They possess the world's greatest paintings, the richest treasures in early church art, in cathedrals, tombs, historic battle fields, chateaus, and castles old in story. But ours is more a land of opportunity, and we lead them in newspapers, in hotels, in public schools, in sanitation, in enterprise, in public conveniences, in push and energy, and enjoy a higher level of average intelligence.

In southern France particularly, and in Italy, they farm with oxen, using a primitive plow. They cut their grain with a reap hook. The homes of the peasants have dirt floors and are poorly ventilated. Over there much precious daylight is wasted in sleep, in the slow sipping of wine, in the idle smoking of endless cigarettes by both men and women. Over there are many peasants seemingly permanently attached to the soil, without hope of aspiring to better things. We have no peasant class. Every man in America is a sovereign and every woman is a queen, with no limitation either by law or custom that might retard them in their efforts to acquire wealth or power.

These great old countries are picturseque, fertile, full of long-ago wonders, and the stirring happenings of to-day. For these reasons I wanted to see them and our allies and study them and the war at close range and identify myself in the closest way possible with the thrilling drama now being played on Europe's blood-stained stage.

We left New York on the French liner Rochambeau on July 5 accompanied by 14 transports bearing 54,000 thousand soldiers. On our boat were 1,100 American boys, 440 Polish volunteers, 40 Alpine Chasseurs a Pied, French shock troops named "Blue Devils" by the Germans, and numerous Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. people. These soldiers of ours and the bright, clear-eyed men and women of the patriotic associations showed no timid weakness. Their strong faces were aglow with high resolution. They were leaving peaceful homes to enter upon a career full of thrilling adventure, beset with risk and hardship, but offering rare opportunity for distinguished service to humanity. Their eyes and souls were fixed on bleeding France, where the red angel of war has not yet folded his crimson wings, dripping these four years with the precious blood of the world's bravest. They go to write a gilded page in the somber leaves of this young century's bloody chronicles. They will help to make this a golden age of heroes and heroines. Verily, this is a period of rapid-fire body and spiritual changes. The quiet farmer boy of to-day becomes the high-souled leader of a glorious charge to-morrow. The late ribbon clerk in a department store next week may receive from a king the coveted medal for a deed of valor. A bookkeeper in a country store is soon made into a leather-helmeted knight of the air, hurling death bombs or dying in a flaming plane in agony but in honor. Girls who yesterday smirked, giggled, and flirted are in the fierce spiritual uplift incident to these stirring times born over and are now closing the dying eyes of battle-scarred heroes, nursing wounded soldiers, scrubbing hospital floors, mending and washing for fighting men, rising to supreme heights never even imagined in their wildest day dreams. A few weeks over there and things back here seem to them as far away as the half-forgotten dreams of childhood.

BASTILE DAY.

In mid-ocean we celebrated July 14, the French Fourth of July, the anniversary of the fall of the Bastile, by a liberal display of the tricolor of France grouped with the Stars and Stripes. A squad of Polish recruits sang their national anthem, Americans the Star-Spangled Banner, the French the Marseillaise, and the Blue Devils their battle song.

SHIPS THAT PASS IN THE NIGHT.

Boats now crossing the Atlantic are armed, and to avoid the iron greetings of the murderous U-boat they are convoyed for a day or so from shore by submarine chasers, destroyers, and airplanes. They also carry depth bombs of T. N. T., the most effective weapon so far devised against the undersea craft. They receive wireless messages, but send none unless they are struck or engaged in battle with the enemy. They paint their sides in stripes of black, blue, and white, and, thus camouflaged, they deceive the eye and confuse the aim of the submarine gunner. Now, ships that pass in the night do not speak each other in passing, but great unsocial, zebra-striped monsters of the deep, they glide like huge spotted ghosts through the waves, with lights out, with portholes closed, with no friendly greeting to other craft, with no answering hail, shunning friend and foe alike.

We landed at Bordeaux about the time the Germans began their last push for Paris. The squares and vacant places of this quaint old city were filled with great wine casks. This is the red and white wine section. America was there. We have two base hospitals located here. We have built great docks and warehouses, and have supplies stored there to sustain a million men for 45 days.

We went from this port through southern France, through fertile Gascony intensively cultivated, through picturesque Provence to Marseille, twenty-five hundred years old. Here the French soldiers in 1792 first sang the song written by Rouget de Lisle, of Strassburg, and it became the national anthem. It is named the Marseillaise after this city. The Americans were here also preparing more trouble for the Huns.

Skirting the blue Mediterranean, most beautiful of seas, flanked on the left by the Maritime Alps, we passed along the Riviera to Genoa, home of Columbus. We made a pious pilgrimage to his boyhood dwelling, visited the local American ambulance camp with 1,637 members, then on to Rome, accompanied from Genoa by our colleague, Capt. LA GUARDIA, now in the Italian aviation service.

FAIR ITALY.

Wise, or perhaps just favored by the great god Chance, were the old Romans in the selection they made for the central state of their world empire; seabound as it is on three sides, with the flanking crescent of snowcapped mountains on the north, watered by the Tiber, the Po, the Brenta, the Piave, the Rubicon, clean, clear rivers flowing through fertile valleys. We spent two days in the Imperial City, sightseeing, marveling at the stately grandeur of her lofty walls, her Pantheon, the Coliseum, baths, tombs, and lastly the forum (long ago planned, built, and enjoyed by the mighty descendants of the she wolf's litter). The effect a sight of the forum produces on a visitor is that of surprise at the smallness of the area in which such important and varied affairs were transacted. It is an oblong space extending northwest and southeast. Its greatest length is 230 yards from the rostra at the foot of Capitoline Hill to the Regia at the foot of Sacra Via. The breadth of the open area is about 80 yards. From this forum the then known world was ruled. It was originally a marshy bit of ground at the foot of the Palatine and Quirinal Hills, and was drained in the time of the kings by the great sewer, Cloaca Maxima, the remains of which we saw. Here our party saw the spots where Verres and Milo were tried, Cicero prosecuting Verres; where the bodies of Sulla and Julius Caesar were burned; where the arch politician, Mark Antony, by his tactful oratory lashed the Roman mob to violence; where the golden-lipped Cicero delivered his marvelous orations. There stood the Rostra Julia of Augustus, from which the Emperors as late as Hadrian addressed the people on great occasions. We saw the ruins of Nero's golden palace, and the temple of the Vestal Virgins, the remains of the Arch of Severus. On the south side of the forum close to the Temple of Saturn are the remains of the Arch of Tiberius, erected in 16 A. D., and close by the ruins of the great Basilica Julia, which was begun by Julius Caesar and finished by Augustus. The street on the east side of the basilica was the Vicus Tuscus, which led from the forum to the Circus Maximus, which the poet Horace alludes to as filled with tradesmen who wrapped up their goods in the manuscripts of inferior poets. On the north and south sides of the forum were butcher shops. It was from one of these that Virginius snatched the knife with which he stabbed his daughter to save her from the hands of Appius Claudius.

Rome is a city of contrasts; half Catholic, half Protestant, half ancient, half new. The poor live cheek by jowl with the rich. "A palace in the Ghetto and a hovel in the Corso have each existed without offense." Side by side stand modern skyscrapers and ancient ruins. Challenging each other, towers St. Peter's, the largest and richest church in the world; and not far away stands an old pagan temple with no pretentions to size, value, or importance. Here is a narrow, dirty, crooked street; there a clean, broad boulevard or square. Here the red hat and bright silk cloak of a cardinal have their splendor heightened by rubbing against the ragged black blouse of the beggar.

Rome's population has varied as much as her fortunes. It now has less than 500,000. Under the Flavian Emperors, she had 2,000,000; during the reign of Augustus, 1,300,000; in 1377 only 17,000.

We were shown many courtesies by that cultured Virginia author and gentleman, Ambassador Page; by Col. Buckey, by the Italian Government, by the premier, Orlando; by Sonnino, minister of foreign affairs; and by Marconi, now a commander in the Italian Navy. A reception was given us by both houses of the Italian Parliament, during which time a speech of welcome was delivered by the President of the Senate, and responded to by one of our number. King Victor Emanual, a very popular and democratic sovereign, entertained us at dinner at Villa Italia, near Padua, and this was followed by a reception by Gen. Diaz at his Army headquarters.

The valley of the Po, the Piave, the Brenta, and the lands about Padua, Verona, and Venice are wonderfully fertile, and are traversed by the best of roads. Near Treviso we witnessed a novel spectacle. A military fête was held there on July 23, at which the King and his generals reviewed the Third Army, which a short time before had defeated the Austrians with great slaughter and drove them back across the Piave. This army was commanded by the Duke of Aosta, first cousin to the King, and a much more imposing figure than his royal kinsman. Our party walked around the field, and also from the stand reviewed the various units of the 6,000 troops here assembled. These troops presented a fine appearance. Many of them were very young men. The average Italian, especially from North Italy, is a handsome and martial figure. The officers are especially fine looking in their smart caps and gray-green uniforms, the most attractive of all the allied uniforms. Italy lost 50,000 of her officers the first year of the war. These officers and soldiers are high-type men. Many of them are tall, fair, with strong bold faces. Many of them speak French, and not a few know English.

This was a gala occasion. The reviewing stand was gay with fluttering flags. The standards of the allies were grouped, and these, with a plentiful supply of bunting, made a brave showing.

It seemed a revival of the medieval chivalric meetings and celebrations, the last of which was the Field of the Cloth of Gold, half way between Guisnes and Arde, at which were Henry VIII and Francis I and their knights and ladies.

For the purpose of comparison, I quote from an old writer a brief description of this historical pageant:

> Friday and Saturday were occupied in preparing the field for the tournament. The lists were 900 feet in length and 320 feet broad. Galleries hung with tapestry surrounded the inclosure, and on the right side in the place of honor were two glazed chambers for the two queens. A deep fosse served to keep off the crowd. The entrances were guarded by 12 French and 12 English archers, and at the foot of the lists stood the tree of nobility; cloth of gold served for the trunk and dried leaves; the foliage was of green silk; the flowers and fruits of silver and Venetian gold. Christendom had never witnessed such a scene. The favorite usages of the courts of love and beauty were revived once more. The medieval age had gathered up its departing energies for this last display of its favorite pastime, henceforth to be consigned without regret to "the moldering lodge of the past."
> There were knights in armor, squares, grooms of the chamber, gentlemen ushers, and, to add to the splendor, Cardinal Woolsey was present riding on a barded mule draped in crimson velvet, with gold front stalls, buckles, and stirrups, accompanied by 50 archers wearing jackets of red cloth adorned with a gold rose before and behind. These ceremonies lasted many days. There were much feasting, drinking, courting, and jousting, and knighthood was conferred on many.

Such was the last medieval pageant, the most imposing of its kind in history.

Now, at this modern Italian ceremonial witnessed by our party there was no lavish or useless display of wealth, but it was an event new to us and well worth seeing. The affair had a romantic setting. It occurred on the wide, fertile plain stretching from the Adriatic along the Piave and Brenta Rivers, with the bald Alpine peaks to the north, from behind which the sullen boom of Austria's big guns could be heard and the Italian cannon stubbornly giving shot for shot. Instead of archers, spearmen, swordsmen, knights in armor, there rode by the reviewing stand the athletic shock troops, who rush the enemy with the bayonet, drive him out of the trench, and then give way to the infantry, who are expected to hold the ground gained. Next came the artillery units; then the cavalry, armed with lance, a short carbine, long saber, and pistol; then the solid infantry; next troops that operate the deadly machine gun; then the motorcycle men; and, in place of the prancing mail-clad charger, the lowly mule, carrying on his back the mountain howitzer; then Alpine foot soldiers with a single feather in their hats; next the showy Berseglieri, with a patch of flaming plumes flashing in the soft sunlight. On one side was a huge observation balloon keeping guard, and overhead—something that Henry VIII and Francis I never dreamed of on the Field of the Cloth of Gold—a Caproni bombing machine was circling over the field, and, darting above and below it, now hundreds of feet in the air, now skimming close to the ground, a fast battle plane, a light war-hawk, flew, graceful and fearless, with wings as steady and sure as an Alpine eagle in the blue air of his near-by haunts.

In addition to decorating 900 Italian and allied soldiers for acts of bravery in battle, the King decorated with medals of valor the following American Red Cross men and English nurses: Alfred Collinson, of Massachusetts; John W. Miller, of Minnesota; John Gordon, of Vermont; James Gillespie, Lucius Davidson, and Fred Agate, of New Jersey; and Miss Muriel Perry and Mrs. Wynne, Red Cross nurses from England. The American Red Cross unit, consisting of 28 persons, during the eight and one-half days of the last battle of the Piave carried from the battle field 10,440 wounded soldiers.

Italian officers took us to the battle front on the Piave, and here for the first time we heard the sinister whine of Austrian shells exploding in plain view but obligingly far enough away to be harmless.

We were also taken up Monte Grappa, 5,000 feet high, among the trenches and dugouts, as far as our guides would permit us to go. No one can appreciate the difficulty of the terrain without personally visiting it over which the Italians are fighting.

Italy has made a good record in the war, barring the one great failure occurring last fall, when the virus of Bolshevikism infected for a time her soldiers, causing the regrettable debacle of Caporetto, about which Italians now avoid talking. The former commander in chief, Gen. Cadorna, at the beginning of the war boldly took the offensive, a course indispensable if victory is to be achieved, and steadily gained ground, the most difficult an army ever fought upon. Now Gen. Diaz has the situation well in hand and his superb army will continue to advance. We should send them ten divisions or more American troops to hearten and help them. On the second day of the last Piave battle Gen. Diaz is reputed to have said, "Now give us a few American divisions; we will first shake hands and then travel together into Austria." [Applause.]

Before the war Germany, through banking and business connections, was rapidly acquiring a strangle grip on Italy. That grip has been shaken off and can not be renewed after the close of hostilities.

When Italy cast her lot with the entente Germans said her aid was unimportant, that she was a nation of mandolin players, a country of artists, beggars, and brigands. Italy has been reborn. She has the artistic temperament, it is true, but now her soul is stirred to sacrifice and bent on victory. The fiery breath of war has kindled into a flame the long smouldering embers of martial aspiration, and now she had rather have the world admire her for her stern military virtues than love her for her sunny skies and her purple hills, her soft charms and sapphire seas. This "woman's country," barring the one regrettable incident already mentioned, has shown a tenacity and sturdiness of purpose worthy of her old-time achievements in war. Sterner peoples have ascribed lightness to this ally of ours. She has been a resort for tourists, and no one can feel the caress of her gentle winds, perfumed with the sweet breath of her myrtle and oleanders, without longing to visit her again. She has had a host of foreign lovers. She is beautiful, handsomely gowned, and jeweled by the hand of God and man; she is a land of sentiment, a holiday land, filled with palaces and pictures, memories and ruins, villas and vineyards, museums and art galleries; but now she is no longer the Italy of dreams; she is aroused. Her sons are driving the invader from her sacred soil and her soldiers are intensely serious and are showing a fortitude, a silent patience, a tireless industry, and an unbroken faith in the righteousness of her cause that bodes ill for her haughty Austrian neighbor. [Applause.]

Italy will be a different country after the war. She will shake off the German grip on her finances and her business interests. She will still have her poetic charms, her priceless treasures given her by God and the exalted genius of her architects, her sculptors, and her painters. She will continue to send forth great singers and breed great orators, poets, and historians, but she will play also a different rôle among the nations of the world and play it well. Her progressive statesmen say she is tired of living on the glories of her past, the glories that come to her from ancient valor and greatness or from later genius. She is determined soon to have the clanging factory, the tall chimney, the beating hammers, and a great merchant marine. She will then keep her sons at home, instead of sending them elsewhere to develop alien countries. She will then be no longer impotent, no longer dependent, particularly upon Germany, her selfish one-time ally.

When this struggle is ended this ally of ours must have Italia Irredenta. She must have a border that she can more easily defend. There must be a radical rectification of her northeastern frontiers, determined arbitrarily long ago by the iron will of Bismack strictly in the interests of Germany and Austria. [Applause.]

FRANCE.

At Paris we met President Poincairé; grim old Clemenceau, "The Tiger"; and other great Frenchmen; saw the noisy Deputies in debate; visited the obscure corner where Lafayette sleeps in a modest tomb, and dropped a white rose on the rough slab that covers him. We went through Notré Dame, in many respects the richest and rarest of the great cathedrals. It was sandbagged and some of the stained glass had been removed to keep it safe from the bombs of the vandals. The world has lost the art of making this rare cathedral glass, and how eagerly the Hun strives to destroy it! We visited Versailles, which cost when built a billion francs, an immense sum in those days, and largely because of the extravagance incident to its erection and maintenance it also cost Louis XVI and the beautiful Marie Antoinette their heads.

The spot where the guillotine stood in Place de la Concorde, the Place de la Bastile, and a hundred historical places were visited, not omitting Napoleon's tomb. The "Little Corporal" sleeps in his black sarcophagus, buried under several tons of sandbags.

This is an artillery war, and he was an artillery officer. How the Corsican's eagle soul would delight to come back to earth and launch an allied attack on the hated Hun and drive him back from the soil of his beloved France. Reading through the roster of his victories on the Arch de Triumph, what small skirmishes were Lodi, Marengo, Austerlitz, compared to Charleroi, Mons, Verdun, and the battles of the Marne.

The German long-distance gun 76 miles away was dropping shells in Paris every 18 minutes during two days of our stay. These shells can not be seen coming and no one can tell where they will hit, so nobody pays any attention to them. I saw where one of them had just wrecked the Hotel Calais, not far from the Place de la Concorde. I became convinced that it is the duty of the allies to respond in kind to the German campaign of frightfulness and bomb every enemy city that can be approached with our bombing planes. If they kill our women and children, why should we spare theirs? If we show any tender compassion, they ascribe it to weakness or fear of them. Stern reciprocity is the only argument that appeals to a Hun, and the old scriptural doctrine of an eye for an eye should be applied in all severity to them. [Applause.]

Paris is the fascinating woman that the Germans long to lay their lustful hands upon. To take her, the Kaiser's generals have sent to their shallow graves 2,000,000 of their bravest soldiers. Once in 1914 they were east of Meaux, less than 20 miles of her, and the prize seemed almost within their greedy grasp, but Joffre saw an opening in their divisions and was quick to seize his opportunity and hurled them back, staggering, bloody, and beaten for a time. Again in June and July, 1918, they drove their veteran legions almost in sight of this rich beauty, and who saved her then from spoliation and ruin? Not her own brave blue-coated Frenchmen, as fierce fighters as ever battled for holy cause or home; not the gallant yellow-clad English; not the game Italian; not North Africa, Canada, New Zealand, nor Australia; but the clear-eyed, smooth-faced lads of America. [Applause.] They stopped the Hun in his march on Paris. The initiative was snatched from them; it is now with us. They turned him back. They drove him homeward, and, God bless them, they are driving him yet and will continue to drive him till he lands in hades or Berlin. Paris, the beautiful, is still standing, charming as a May queen, on the banks of the winding Seine, garlanded with flowers, untouched and unpolluted by German vandals, grateful, smiling, and bowing thanks to the boys of Gen. Pershing who saved her from capture and dishonor. They did this very thing. [Applause.]

I saw the Bois de Belleau, where American bayonets drank deep of German blood, where our marines, in the fog and mists of No Man's Land stopped the boche and drove him eastward. There stood between the Germans and Paris these handsome young marines, but they were enough. Some crack French troops at a distance saw this brilliant work, and their officers said to ours, "We thought Americans would fight, but now we know it. We have never seen greater courage. We consider it an honor to fight side by side with such soldiers." Our soldiers are fresh and full of pep. They charge ugly machine-gun nests and take them; they always take them, and then they hold them. The Germans call them "teufel hunds," or "devil dogs."

I saw the fighting beyond Chateau-Thierry on July 29. Chateau-Thierry is a little place badly shot up. The beautiful Marne flows at its feet. It has a sixteenth century church, has narrow streets, and still narrower or no sidewalks, after the manner of old French towns. It has grown up around a very old, deep-dungeoned chateau, from which the town takes its name. It has a population of 7,000. I went up the hill and inspected the remains of the old chateau, and found nothing left but a black, thick-set, stone tower, with a deep dungeon on either side of the arch. Charles the Simple, a feeble successor of Charles Martel, was confined as a prisoner here; but the two dungeons are now filled with old shoes, bottles, clothing, and abandoned German loot. Two American cavalrymen were there, and one of them handed me a small brass button that he had cut from a dead German's blouse. The chateau was built in 720 by Charles Martel, the "Hammer of the Franks," who saved Europe from the savage Saracens in the Battle of Tours. He was the grandfather of Charlemagne, the greatest man of the Middle Ages. Chateau-Thierry has heard the battle cries of all sorts of warriors—Saracen, Spaniard, Hun, English, French, and finally American—and since mid-July the world agrees that no braver soldiers ever fought or bled in her narrow streets than these same American crusaders. [Applause.]

Chateau-Thierry blocks the path to Paris 39 miles waay, and this is why the hills and hollows round about have so often resounded with the clanging noise of battle. The place changed hands often during the early centuries. English archers took it in 1421; toward the close of the Hundred Years' War, the long war which finally brought from the fields of Lorraine Joan of Arc, the woman on horseback, to lead the armies of France to victory. The Germans, led by Charles V, took the place in the sixteenth century; a half century later the Spaniards sacked it. Here the boy-faced Napoleon smashed the allied nations in 1814, and a century later, this home of the French poet and master of fables, La Fontaine, this scene of long-ago battles, heard a new war cry, that of intrepid America, driving before her at the point of the bayonet the long victorious army of the crown prince. [Applause.]

All around this sector American soldiers distinguished themselves for bravery and endurance and drove the Boche each day. They had cleared the country of the foe, but the signs of grim battle were everywhere. Trees 2 feet in diameter had been cut squarely in two by the big guns. Villages were wrecked. Fields yellow with ripened wheat were pitted and pock-marked with great shell holes. I counted eight dead horses where a few hours before there had been a cavalry charge. Bear in mind all this was open fighting. We passed a peasant woman driving an old gray horse hitched to a cart, with the scanty household furniture piled thereon, going back to the lately abandoned stone hut that the Americans had just won back for her, and, as we returned late in the afternoon, she had set up housekeeping again in the little home, one side of which and most of the roof had been wrecked by either German or American shells in cross firing, but from the one small window a dusty and tattered curtain flew as proudly as a flag. Stone by stone, with her own hands, this patient peasant woman will rebuild that wrecked home, and may God grant that the terrible Boche will not drive her therefrom again. [Applause.]

On the way to the American front I passed through Vaux, reduced to a dust heap by our artillery, and for the first time smelt that never-to-be-forgotten odor of decaying human bodies still in the débris of the wrecked buildings. Concerning Vaux is this interesting item: Col.—now Gen.—Brown, of Kentucky, stated to members of our party that before Vaux, then in the possession of the Germans, was taken by our men our officers had ascertained through spies that the Germans there were short of men. This report was confirmed in another way. One of our privates shot a carrier pigeon belonging to the Germans with a dispatch in code tied to it. The dispatch was deciphered and gave the information that the German commanding officer must have 600 more men at once. It had been agreed between the French and American officers before this that the Americans were to attack in 10 hours. When the information carried by the pigeon was received, the Americans insisted on attacking in three hours. The supreme command was with the French, who protested, but the American plan prevailed. They attacked in three hours, before German reinforcements came, and Vaux was reduced and the Germans there that were not killed were captured. [Applause.]

Through Vaux our party went to the fighting front. The nearer the battle lines the more congested the roads became. Prisoners and ambulances loaded with wounded were coming back. Supply wagons and fresh troops were moving forward. Observation balloons, bombing machines, swift-flying Spads, light-winged chasses were here and there, but not in sufficient numbers; at least, not sufficiently alert in the particular fighting area that we were watching. We stood with helmet and gas mask on beside an artillery officer who was directing the gun fire of his battery. He complained that we were short of fighting and observation planes at this part of the field. He had just made that observation when three large German bombing machines came over our lines dropping bombs nearby. They broke a supply train in two, killing one man, wounding many. When they got in range our antiaircraft guns began firing on them. All around us we could hear the rat-tat-tat of machine guns, and I saw some soldiers shoot at them with their rifles. The hostile planes got safely away, however, and the two fighting planes that soon appeared from our side were too late to get them.

We saw considerable fighting in the Soissons-Chateau-Thierry-Rheims salient. Fortunately it was open fighting. The enemy was retreating, which fact enabled us to get close to the actual battle, conducted as we were by an Army officer.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I wonder if the gentleman, who was our chairman and spokesman, and who made mighty good speeches upon official occasions at Rome, Paris, and London, will admit he requested the members of our party to go five minutes before to the particular hill or the particular spot where those bombs fell. It would have taken about five minutes to have gotten to that particular spot, and probably we would have been there if we had taken the gentleman's advice.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman's statement, so far as it applies to our good fortune in escaping danger, is correct. I do not agree to his statement on the subject of the speeches. They were poor and commonplace.

I studied the German prisoners at short range. They are thin, grim, determined fellows, human machines drilled to slaughter. Some of them are very young, but others are gray haired. All look tired and warworn. Many of them are small men. Most of them are blonds. The Prussian guardsmen, however, are big fellows. Our officers say that if these prisoners are questioned within two hours after their capture they will almost invariably tell the truth about themselves and their armies, the explanation being that they are not sure but that they may be killed, but as soon as they realize that they are safe they are not so reliable. A general told us that the allied command obtained from captured Germans detailed and accurate information as to the exact place and hour when the last drive on Paris was to be made.

All through France we saw German prisoners at work, well fed and happy.

During the first few days of the great drive, beginning on March 21, these prisoners, thinking that Paris and the channel ports would soon be taken by their comrades and that the war would end in a short time, with Germany victorious, struck and declined to work. They were then put on bread and water, and soon asked to be allowed to work again. The Austrian prisoners appear inferior to the Germans, both mentally and physically. I saw a batch of these Boche prisoners brought into the first emergency field hospital. Promptly the American boys cut the buttons off their coats and passed them around as souvenirs. One of them was having his wound sterilized against tetanus, a slight bayonet wound brought on himself by his stubbornness, when he had refused to march off the field after he had been captured.

Our boys appear to hate the Boche more than do our allies. They claim the Germans will throw up their hands and cry "Kamerad," and then shoot as long as there is a chance to kill. This Hun pleasantry has resulted in fewer prisoners being taken by Americans, who no longer heed the hypocritical cry of "Kamerad," used by the enemy to throw them off their guard. [Applause.]

I spent some time at the first emergency hospital, just back of our lines. Load after load of wounded came in for first treatment. American doctors first injected antitetanus serum in the wounds and then passed the men on for other treatment. The Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. were present everywhere, doing splendid service. There was much blood, much suffering, but everything possible was done for the wounded. Mothers of America, your boys are well cared for, sick, wounded, or well. I saw and talked with two young men suffering from shell shock. With few exceptions, everybody was laughing and joking and treating the occasion with true American philosophy and unconcern.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIER.

Right here let me offer my poor but sincere tribute to the American soldier. He is pouring into France in a wide golden stream, 300,000 every month. He has turned the red tide of battle Rhineward. But for him England, Italy, and France would now be defeated or fighting with their backs to the very last wall. He is as good as the best shock troops of the allies, as good as the Alpini or befeathered Berseglieri of Italy, the Blue Devils of France, the naked-kneed Highlanders of Scotland, as good as the best of the bulldog breed of New Zealand or Australia, as good as the bravest of the lion's litter from England or Canada. I have Gen. Pershing's word for it that he is as good as the Kaiser's best. He has fought Jaegar, Saxon, Bavarian, and Prussian guardsmen, and he has driven these seasoned veterans from every bloody field when he met them or could overtake them. [Applause.]

He goes into action like a blue-eyed Viking. He bleeds with a smile on his face or dies with a jest between his teeth. He is possessed of the Puritan steadfastness of Cromwell's roundheads and the dashing gallantry of the blue-blooded aristocrats who rode with Prince Rupert. His grandfather, who charged with Pickett at Gettysburg or marched with Sherman to the sea, will never be ashamed of his record in this world struggle. The French and Italians are best in the charge. The English fight best at bay, against desperate odds; but the American is an ideal fighter, whether charging or on defense. Europe is aflame with admiration for this soldier from across the sea. Europe now rings with his praises, and Europe of the entente sleeps more soundly and Germany sleeps less soundly now that he is there. [Applause.]

Unlike the brave Frenchman, he is not seeking to drive an armed invader from his native heath; he is not fighting to prevent a merciless vandal from despoiling his fair villages and cities; he is not beating off lustful beasts in human form from the home where dwells his mother, sister, or wife. The wide Atlantic lies between this soldier boy and his loved ones. He is fronting the best-trained soldiers the world has ever known, 4,000 miles away from home, sweetheart, and native land. And thus he fights. The more honor to him. He is a crusader, battling for an ideal as much so as did any knightly follower of Richard Cour de Leon or Godfrey of Bouillon. That is why poilu and Tommy love him and love to fight by his side. They are brothers in arms; and in the long golden years to come they will cherish this comradeship, nor will any of these war-time associates forget "The look of men that ha' brothered men by more than an easy breath; the eyes of men that ha' read wi' men in the open books of death."

FRANCE.

But France and the French soldier and the French women deserve unstinted praise. Rose-hearted France, the favorite sister in this family of friendly nations. Her fertile plains have been devastated, her cities and villages laid waste, her soil drenched with the blood of enemy and ally.

France without her Paris, without her Versailles, without her Jeanne de Arc, her Napoleon, Henry of Navarre, Lafayette, Louis XIV, her Richelieu, without the brilliant glories of her scintillating past, is entitled to the plaudits and the respect of the world for what she has suffered and achieved in this war.

It was harvest time in France when I saw it. Those brave people jest at famine. High up close to the snow line on the steep sides of the Alps I noted the green and gold of alternating acre plats of wheat and growing gardens. From the gray solitudes of Brittany to the sunny slopes of the Pyrenees, the women of France have kept the village homes and made the crops. Their young men are at the front fighting or are sleeping in the soil they loved. The horses have been conscripted, the cattle, sheep, and chickens have gone to feed the army. Only the women are at home. Driving through the country with Admiral Wilson, I studied the picturesque peasants of Bretagne and I saw only a very few old men wearing black-ribboned hats, the mark of the peasant of Bretagne, but not a young man anywhere. The admiral explained that the Bretagne division met the shock of the German charge at Chemin des Dames and were decimated. But everywhere were the stout, big-boned, black-gowned peasant women, wearing a bit of white lace on their heads, clattering along in wooden shoes, doing woman's work, man's work, and the work of horses and oxen as well. I take off my hat to the peasant women of France. They have pushed back the crimson flood of war with their bare brown hands. Their achievements during this war have been stupendous, their sufferings and endurance epic. [Applause.]

The French are idealists. Their state motto is liberty, equality, fraternity. They love their beautiful land. They do not often leave it. It is something worth fighting for. No soldiers among the allies have fought better, few have fought as well. I had opportunity to study the French soldiers closely. They have a serious look upon their strong faces. They seldom smile. They are war weary. I saw them going forward to the front where machine guns were cracking. Again, I saw them returning from the trenches, mud stained, dust covered, singed with the fires of hell, solemn, but with the lofty spirit of France shining in their eyes. And the whole world can learn a lesson of politeness at the feet of the French. High or low, aristocrat or peasant, officer or private, man or woman, they are the very flower and fruitage of courtesy and good manners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the gentleman very much.

They brought in a slim French soldier at the field hospital just back of the lines beyond Vaux. He had been, they told me, a Parisian Apache, one of the dangerous criminal class before the war, but who are now fighting and dying for the tricolor. He was black with blood from an ugly wound in the neck and was vomiting. Every time the American doctor or Red Cross assistant served him in any way, no matter how trivial the service, sick as he was he would smile and say, "Merci, m'sieur." As long as a Frenchman is conscious he never forgets to be polite.

Long live France! She belongs to the world. Jefferson, who loved France, said, "Every man has two countries, his own and France." France has saved civilization at great personal sacrifice many times. She is performing a lion's part in doing so now.

I am strong to love this noble France,
This poet of the nations, who dreams on Forever after some ideal good,
Some equal poise of sex, some unvowed love,
Inviolate, some spontaneous brotherhood,
Some wealth that leaves none poor, and finds none tired,
Some freedom of the many that respects
The wisdom of the few.

[Applause.]

ENGLAND.

London seemed more like home. Here the names on the shops are like ours, and the people speak the language of Shakespeare. London is huge, solid, conservative, and with many beauty spots. As a home, I should think London preferable to Paris, but neither equal to America. The English were very kind to us. Lord Northcliffe, who owns several English newspapers and who makes and remakes cabinets, and who did not inherit his title but earned it, received us at Poynter Hall, one of his country estates. He there introduced us to his aged mother, who lives with him. Sir Campbell Stuart, of Canada, an Irishman with a Scotch name, entertained us at luncheon. We met Sir Eric Geddes, First Lord of the Admiralty, who used to work in Pittsburgh at a dollar a day and also labored as a hired railroad hand in West Virginia. We saw many streets and places made famous by Charles Dickens and went through London Tower, where Queen Elizabeth was confined for a time charged with treason. We went up into the Bloody Tower, where Richard III caused the two young princes to be murdered, and saw instruments of torture, dark cells, the wooden block and steel ax used by our cheerful ancestors in cutting off the heads of many good and loyal English men and women. We visited London Bridge, St. Paul's, Whitehall, the Bank of England, the law courts, and many places well worth seeing.

On August 1 we saw the House of Commons in session, by far the most dignified body of the kind in Europe. Mr. Speaker, Right Hon. James William Lowther presided in gown and wig. Some members sat with hats on, others bareheaded. We heard Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, explain the new supplementary credits bill for £700,000,000. He spoke in a dignified, high-keyed tone, with no effort at oratory, and was given close attention.

On the same day, the following, among others, spoke: Mr. Dillon, Mr. McKenna, Ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Snowden, Sir Willoughby Dickerson, Mr. McCurdy, Maj. H. Terrel, Maj. E. Wood, Sir F. Banbury, Mr. Balfour, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Holt, Lord Robert Cecil, Assistant Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and Sir L. Worthington Evans. They discussed the credit measure, the proposed league to enforce peace, the military situation, the Russian question, referred a time or two to the Irish problem, and spoke on labor and other current subjects. Their demeanor was dignified, their language temperate, their sentiments lofty, and they seemed studiously polite and considerate in addressing or referring to one another. They appear older on the average than our House Members. On the day mentioned the house met at a "quarter before three of the clock," to quote from the official proceedings, and adjourned at 10.30 p. m.

FOURTH ANNIVERSARY AT ST. MARGARET'S.

On Sunday, August 4, we were present by special invitation at the Anglican Church, St. Margaret's, where the fourth anniversary of England's entrance into the war was celebrated. From the King downward the whole nation joined in prayer on that day. It was a solemn consecration of the nation's cause. The gathering at St. Margaret's was, they said, unprecedented. There, in stately procession, the great men of the realm passed in solemn procession up the central aisle of the church. King George and Queen Mary, Princess Mary, the Queen Mother Alexandra, Mr. Balfour, Lloyd-George, the Prime Minister, and other ministers of the Crown, and prominent officials in church, naval, and military affairs and Government, the Lord Chancellor leading the peers, the speaker leading the Commons. The King was in naval uniform. He is not as tall as Queen Mary. The Queen was dressed in black. It was a very impressive ceremonial. The music was low and beautiful, and simplicity, reverence, and congregational devotion characterized the service. Peculiarly moving was this supplication:

Brethren, on this fourth anniversary of the declaration of war, let us draw near to the throne of God in penitence and humility; let us pray Him to deliver us from the temptations that beset us and, if it be His will, to grant us victory and peace; let us implore His help for the men and women who are engaged at home or abroad in carrying on the war; and let us thank Him for mercies already vouchsafed to us.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, white-haired and eloquent, preached from the text Exodus, xx: 7, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord, thy God, in vain." It was one of the most eloquent pulpit utterances I ever heard, and I quote from the sermon two extracts, following:

THE VISION OF LASTING PEACE.

As we offer together to God to-day such prayers as these, our vision ranges onward into the coming years. The world has been learning by fearful experience what war actually is. The facts have been burned into our living souls. To most of us war used to seem a far-off thing. There was about it a romance and glamor, which pushed its horribleness, not out of sight, but out of the foreground. Four years have taught us much. They have not diminished, they have enhanced, the glory, the imperishable dignity, of the deeds of heroic sacrifice at which we proudly and thankfully marvel. But they have taught us, too, in plain prose war's unspeakable hatefulness, and those who have been in closest and most honorable touch with all the realities of such a war are the first to resolve that please God a repetition of its ghastly horrors shall become impossible among men.

To that outcome, on this fourth anniversary, we set our thoughts, we attune our prayers. Though the vision tarry, wait for it. Somehow, somewhen, it must by the help of the living God be brought to pass. The ending of it forever and ever must be in accordance with God's purpose. The nations must set themselves thereto. I dare to feel assured that they will.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S ADVICE.

Let us found ourselves on reality and not on appearance. Why—after going through all we have done—should we seek peace at the moment when Germany is declining, but has not yet declined, and when America is beginning, but has only just begun?

President Wilson, with searching thought, has spoken the only word which in these days should be heard in the councils and camps of the allies. "Force without stint, force without restraint, force to the utmost limit" And that is the path upon which the people of the United States—themselves nearly double the population of Germany—have avowedly and whole-heartedly embarked. We must keep in step with them. They are our kinsmen from across the ocean. They are our sons returned from a long estrangement. They are our comrades of the great war and of the greater future. With every day that this strife endures the old misunderstandings are removed and the ancient quarrels vanish away. When we count the fearful cost, let us not forget to count the precious gain. In the community of interest and union of spirit and brotherhood in arms now being recreated between the American people and the British race lies the most solid guaranty of our common safety in years to come, and of the general peace and progress of the world.

Let us therefore look steadily out upon that portion of our task that we have yet to do. Two separate conditions are required of the German people. First, they must be decisively beaten in the field by the armies of the allies. That should be the indispensable preliminary to a cessation of hostilities. Secondly, they should, by their own free and spontaneous action, by an act of self-regeneration, make a definite break with the system which has led them to so many fearful and monstrous crimes. Not till then should they be allowed to take their vacant place in the league of nations and be received into the new brotherhood of mankind.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The most interesting place in England is Westminster Abbey. Once Catholic but now Protestant, it is a combination of cathedral, church, museum, and burial place of the nation's distinguished dead. We were permitted to go through it by the courtesy of an American woman, the daughter of the late William C. Endicott, of Massachusetts, Secretary of War in President Cleveland's first Cabinet. She was the wife of Joseph Chamberlain, now dead, and is at this time married to Canon Carnegie, rector of St. Margaret's and chaplain of the House of Commons. She entertained our party at tea and then conducted us on a three-hour tour through this wonderful place. Here the English Kings are crowned. Here "the brave and the faithful, the strong, the steadfast and true, from palaces and from halls of state, from church and cloister and fair English home, have found peaceful shelter after this painful life is ended."

The architecture of the abbey is a mixture of Norman, Romanesque, Gothic, and Renaissance. It has a thousand interesting spots, but to me the tombs of Edward I, Edward the Confessor, the Black Prince, the rich tombs of Elizabeth and Mary Queen of Scots, the poets' corner, and the statues of British historians, orators, statesmen, and literary men were of absorbing interest. We stood where the body of Cromwell was buried, but after the restoration, 12 years from the death of Charles I, this body was dragged from its resting place among the Kings, drawn on a sled to Tyburn, and hanged at the angles of the gallows facing Whitehall, where King Charles had been executed. The Protector's head was then cut off and set up on a pole. His body, without the head, lies buried now under the street on the old site of Tyburn and "over him the English pass, day by day, no longer fearing him."

Oliver Cromwell was a great Englishman, a great ruler, and during his protectorate he made the British Empire respected throughout the world. Parliament failed to make the required appropriation, so money was collected by public subscription, with which a handsome bronze statue of this great figure in English history was finally erected under the windows of the House of Commons, where it now stands.

Thousands of citizens from all civilized lands who yearly come up to the world's largest city seek out this wonderfully interesting old abbey, rich monument of the past and present glory of England.

Our party saw Westminster under favorable conditions, in the luminous twilight hours of a quiet August evening, under the intelligent guidance of a cultured, gray-haired American woman, transplanted to London but still American in feeling and in sympathy. The great organ, invisible to us, under the hands of a skillful player, gave out soft music as we strolled through aisles of medieval splendor, down the long nave, through the numerous rich chapels, through quaint chambers and ancient cloisters, through a wilderness of statuary, dead images of the mighty, back and forth among tombs of kings and queens and princes and those greater mortals who won and wore star-lit crowns more precious than any that ever adorned the uneasy head of a monarch—crowns such as Burke, Milton, and Charles Dickens wore.

Shakespeare was not buried here, a fact that I regret. I also regret that I am unable to employ his purple verbs and nouns and adjectives instead of my own poor words in describing this matchless abbey of Westminster.

We saw something of rural England in driving from London through the country, by way of Winchester, to Southampton. The farming sections are in a high state of cultivation and each farm is fenced with hedges.

Winchester, long time the capital, is well worth a visit. There the English Parliament met for 400 years. A fine old cathedral is there. There Sir Walter Raleigh was tried, Lord Jeffreys held court, and King Alfred was buried. We drove through the new forest where William Rufus was shot through with an arrow.

From Southampton the Pilgrim Fathers sailed for the land of the free.

Sturdy old England has performed a giant's part in the world war. Her navy has kept the seas open for the transportation of allied troops and supplies. She had only a "contemptible little army" in 1914, so termed by the Kaiser. Since then she has raised and equipped 7,500,000 men, and her red-cheeked lads have shown virile courage and endurance everywhere on her far-flung battle fronts.

HOSPITALS.

We visited the hospitals, more numerous in France and particularly in Paris than elsewhere. The very best medical and surgical skill is at the service of our sick or wounded. Doctors and nurses, well equipped technically and by experience, are in attendance at all hospitals—emergency, field, or base—and are giving conscientious and entirely satisfactory service. I saw the surgeons binding up wounds, relieving pain, operating, giving medicine, advice, and instructions, and nurses attending and watching over sick or wounded boys with the same tender solicitude as their mothers, if such a thing is possible.

Maj. Perkins, American Commissioner of the Red Cross in Europe, entertained us in Paris and showed us through the American Red Cross hospitals Nos. 1, 2, and 5. From him and from other sources we gathered the following valuable information on this subject:

When we entered the war we had only about half a dozen Army hospitals, with something like 5,000 beds. We now have 65 Army hospitals, with 70,000 beds, and will soon be able to care for more than 100,000 sick and wounded at one time. During the Spanish-American War the death rate in the training camps was 20 men out of each 100, but now only 7 out of each 100. When we entered this war only 8,900 of our people were doing hospital work. The number now engaged is 171,000. At the beginning we had only 375 nurses, but now we have 15,000, and the number is daily increasing. Only 14 out of every 100 men wounded are unfitted for further military duty. In other words, 86 of these wounded men will in a short time go back to fighting, and practically all of them complain that they fear the war will be over before they get back to their regiments.

Only about 4 per cent of the men wounded in action die. This showing speaks volumes of good things in praise of medical science, for the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Salvation Army, and other patriotic, altruistic, and religious organizations.

REHABILITATION HOSPITALS.

Last June Congress passed an act which was approved by the President providing for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States. This act provides that the board created by this legislation shall have the power to provide such facilities, instructors, and courses as may be necessary to insure proper training for such persons as are required or may elect to follow the courses provided in said act; to prescribe the courses to be followed by such persons; to pay, when in the discretion of the board such payment is necessary, the expense of travel, lodging, subsistence, and other necessary expenses of such persons while following the prescribed courses; to do all things necessary to insure vocational rehabilitation and to provide for the placement of rehabilitated persons in suitable or gainful occupations. The act further makes it the duty of the board to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their employment or placement in positions suitable to their capacities. To carry out the provisions of this act Congress appropriated $2,000,000 and authorized the board to receive such gifts and donations from either public or private sources as might be offered unconditionally to carry on the work of the board.

I supported the act and made a somewhat critical study of this subject in Europe, where I had an opportunity to observe at first hand the practical application of this humanitarian project.

The French have established several hospitals of this kind, one called the Grande Palais in Paris, and one designated as the Ecole Joffre at Lyons; and the English are maintaining quite a number. One exclusively for the blind at St. Dunstans and one each at Newcastle, Leeds, Cardiff, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dublin, Belfast, Brighton, and Roehampton. I visited and made a careful investigation of the Roehampton plant.

The Roehampton hospitals and shops were first organized, and later workshops were started in Brighton. Queen Mary contributed to the building of the hospitals and shops mentioned and a number of other wealthy English men and women gave large sums of money to maintain these hospitals and carry on this work. The British Government as yet contributes nothing to their support.

At Brighton there is accommodation for as many as 600 men. The men remain there until their wounds are sufficiently healed to permit of their being fitted with artificial appliances. At Brighton the first consideration is the hospital treatment, and the technical training is secondary, but the hospital teaching force begin, as soon as the patient arrives, to coordinate the two separate problems—the healing of his wounds and his education for a gainful occupation after his recovery. At Roehampton, particularly, they train both his limbs and himself for the work that he is expected to do for a livelihood. When the legless and armless patient arrives from Brighton at Roehampton they place in his hand a leaflet giving him full and special instructions as to the facilities offered for gaining knowledge in skilled trades and for fitting themselves for a future career.

One of the principal features of the workshops is the way in which the various classes are adapted and fitted for the trades and professions taught. Students can be seen, especially the legless ones, busily engaged at typewriters, while others pursue studies at large desks, and still others file papers in an up-to-date filing cabinet. Following are some of the types of employment found for men who have lost an arm: Clerk, messenger, porter, schoolmaster, timekeeper, traveler, and watchman. Here are some vocations that they recommend for men who have lost a leg: Chauffeur, electrical worker, gateman, hospital orderly, munition maker, packer, painter, printer, tailor, telegrapher, and timekeeper. During the 18 months since the Roehampton hospitals have been opened they have placed in profitable positions, class A, men placed by the bureau in good positions, 1,294; class B, men returned to their own employment, 2,037; class C, men passed on to the local committee for employment, 1,783. The authorities at Roehampton told me that their experience during the last 18 months teaches them that their patients resolved themselves automatically into three different classes, the proportion of which can be definitely stated. They are as follows: Class A, men who are prepared to work anywhere and for whom employment should be provided before they leave the hospital, 25 per cent; class B, men who have had their places kept open for them and who on discharge from the hospital will return to their former employers, 40 per cent; and class C, men who place domicile before work and who will not discuss employment except in the vicinity of their own homes, 35 per cent. Class A, of course, offers the most urgent problem, as it includes a large proportion of young men and a large number of men with no settled homes. Class B presents no problem at all. Class C is composed mainly of married men, who are prepared to accept any work that they are capable of performing so long as it does not involve the breaking up of their homes. In order to deal effectively with this whole question there must be coordination of effort on the part of the hospital authorities and all other agencies interested in the work of rehabilitation and the employment of men rehabilitated.

I met a large number of these patients, those that had lost a leg appeared to be in the majority, but a great many had lost both arms and some had lost both legs. Many were being fitted with artificial limbs, and I was surprised to learn that 80 per cent of these limbs were manufactured by an American concern, and an American from South Carolina was the manager of the division charged with the duty of fitting the artificial legs and arms to the wounded soldiers. Some of these cripples were personally engaged in fitting limbs on themselves, sandpapering, filing, and preparing them for adjustment. The limbs were made of willow and were fitted with the utmost nicety, and are excellent substitutes for the natural limbs. They have steel contrivances that will enable the wearer to pick up articles from the floor and to do almost as many things with the artificial arm and hand as can be done with the ones nature provided.

Our party saw Sergt. Dore, who lost an arm, use a spade very efficiently, throwing the dirt over his shoulder with his artificial hand and arm. He also showed that he was an expert at cricket and at golf. A young soldier named M. C. Beane, with an artificial leg from his hip down, ran a foot race with an armless but a two-legged soldier and did not lose the race.

There were 920 patients at the hospital at Roehampton when our party visited them—all young, bright-faced English lads, apparently happy, talking cheerfully of the future, and delighted with the fact that they were not more seriously injured than the loss of one or more of their limbs entailed. Their condition also told the story of the deadly efficiency of the German artillery, as practically all of them were wounded by bursting shells. It was an inspiring spectacle to see them going about learning useful trades and talking hopefully of the future.

I gathered, however, from the officers in charge of these hospitals that the problem of dealing with disabled men is one which calls for both sympathy and tact. They can not be driven nor will they submit to harsh restrictions or arbitrary regulations. They must be coaxed, reasoned with, and guided. Left to themselves they will, as a rule, take up work only when obliged to do so, and then only the work which can be obtained with the least trouble. Technical training and reeducation do not instinctively appeal to them. The advantages to be gained have to be placed very clearly before them and they are, generally speaking, attracted only to what they see and to the trades in connection with which the course of training to be faced and the work to be done are practically demonstrated to them. The personal factor is what counts for most in dealing with these men, and without it little good can be done. If their instructors, however, are patient and understand and appeal to the psychology of the patient, and extend him a full measure of sympathy and understanding they can usually be of great service to them in preparation for their future career.

The English Government now gives a reasonable pension to each soldier maimed while in the service, and this pension is not lessened in the smallest degree because of this training given these men. Our own Government has provided generously for those who are injured in this war, but no man is happy unless he is at work and earning something by his own exertions, and for this reason: I regard this work of rehabilitation and this provision for training our maimed soldiers so they can follow some gainful occupation after the war as one of the most useful bits of legislation enacted by the Sixty-fifth Congress.

THE RED CROSS.

It is not remarkable that when the American Red Cross asks for a hundred million for good measure we promptly make it a hundred and fifty million. I carefully studied the Red Cross personnel on shipboard going and coming and over there. They are high-class men and women. They are doing the work of the Master and the work of humanity with zest and spirit. They do things over there. I wanted to notify my son, who is in the Aviation Service, to meet me in Paris. The Red Cross people located him at the front and wired him. Before leaving I asked them to forward him a delayed box of woolen socks, helmets, and sweaters that his mother had knit for him. They did so. They drive you about in their cars. They go to the railway station with you. They maintain information bureaus. They seek out the needy and administer to them. They care for and feed the hungry and helpless among our allies, and, above all, they carry from the field the stricken soldier, bind up his wounds, and nurse him back to health. [Applause.]

THE RED CROSS NURSE.

Hats off to the Red Cross nurse. [Applause.] She is true almost to fanaticism to her calling. I have read of gray-clad women pilgrims toiling over leagues of burning sands, over tall mountains, and marching through wild forests filled with menacing dangers to bring an offering of value or respect or to pay the homage of a devotional visit to some far-away religious shrine. This same spirit can be seen in the eye and in the face of the Red Cross nurse. Firm of mouth and high of head, she leaves the safe shelter of her American home, defying the submarine, unafraid of danger or temptation. She goes about in Europe doing service that should bring her the title and the crown of a saint. Clad in a costume that distinguishes her above all others, attractive and becoming, she is welcome in the field, in the hospital, in the home, everywhere. In all the land everybody respects her. No one would harm her. Her red cross is a charm and a defense against insult or injury, with one exception, and one only. The wolfish Hun alone, who, respecting nothing on the round earth, whenever an opportunity offers, seeks to assail and injure her in any and every way, either by bombing hospitals, ambulances, hospital ships, or otherwise. [Applause.]

I saw her nursing the wounded at the first base hospital we visited. An old boy 4,000 miles from home with a bullet hole through his shoulder needs a lot of mothering. He gets it. I heard one nurse say to another, "Is that your boy?" pointing at a young soldier from Missouri who was inhaling ether, getting ready for an operation. The nurse addressed answered, "Yes; that's my boy," and she said this in a solicitous and a motherly tone, such as his own mother would use. Men of America stand with uncovered heads in the presence of these Red Cross nurses. They are doing great service. They are nursing our boys. They rank queens in grandeur and usefulness. They are as pure in heart as a vestal virgin. They are as chaste as any icicle that ever hung from Diana's temple. It is an honor and a privilege to touch with finger tip the hem of their garments. They go about doing good like saints and ministering angels. This is not an extravagant statement, nor is the Red Cross man second in efficiency or usefulness to the Red Cross woman in his field of activity. [Applause.]

I can not take the time to give anything like a full statement of what our Red Cross has done in Europe in the way of aiding soldiers' families, but I will say that in Italy alone in April, 1918, the Red Cross, through the department of civil affairs, distributed to the needy families of Italian soldiers at the front a special gift of 6,431,000 lire. In this distribution 7,051 towns were reached and 292,044 families were aided.

THE Y. M. C. A.

The men and women of this great organization are entitled to the grateful praise of all America for the uplifting influence they are exerting on our armies at home and overseas. They are softening the frowning front of war. Their good work is world-wide and their record is clean.

Shortly after we landed at Bordeaux we had the good fortune to get dinner at reasonable cost at a restaurant in charge of Mrs. Vanderbilt and a daughter of the late railroad magnate, E. H. Harriman, women of wealth, who are giving their time and money helping the Y. M. C. A. in its war work. At night we were entertained at their picture show. Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, jr., is over there and has general charge of the woman's branch of this work overseas. The Y. M. C. A. rent six hotels at Tours and conduct them for the benefit of our people at less than cost. I visited them at Brest, and they told me that they had bought out a saloon near the harbor landing and converted it into a place of rest and refreshment where boys could buy coffee, cold drinks, candy, and cakes instead of wine and brandy. At Brest this organization has 93 people, 15 per cent of them being women. They maintain reading and rest rooms, and our boys can have mending done there or buttons sewed on without cost. The Y. M. C. A. furnishes high-class picture shows. They have brought lecturers from America, among whom are President Schurman, of Cornell; Anson Phelps Stokes, from Yale; and entertainers like E. H. Sothern, Julia Marlowe, Elsie Janis, Mary Garden, and 50 other talented American players, who are there now solely to amuse, instruct, and entertain, without expense to them, our Army and Navy people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The remainder of the time is in control of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas have 10 minutes more——

The CHAIRMAN. The time was fixed by the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Without being taken out of the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the House.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the time fixed by the House be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the gentleman very much.

Installed in all Y. M. C. A. huts are reading rooms, writing rooms, billiards, pool, checkers, chess, and organized athletics. I have seen thousands of boys at these huts, and I know they are a great help to them in the right way.

The activities of this excellent organization are astounding. Work is now being carried on by them in every continent, in Mesopotamia, Japan, India, Ceylon, Africa, the Philippines, Porto Rico, Turkey, Egypt, Russia, and in all the allied countries. It is doing a great work among the Czecho-Slovak forces. In France alone, the association serves men of 22 nationalities. There are now 538 huts of various sizes and designs in American camps. This number fluctuates as the "Y" lost more than 100 huts in the German drive of last spring.

I can testify that there is little convenience or shelter in the average French village. In many places the Y. M. C. A. hut is the only place where the men can keep warm and write a letter in winter. Every day over there 2,500,000 letters are written on free Y. M. C. A. stationery.

By the way, if you never saw a soldier write a letter home, it would be worth while to see him. I have observed him in the act. He seems to lose sight of his surroundings. He draws within himself. He is oblivious of all things else and is intent on his task. He does not want to be disturbed by jest or serious observation. His thoughts are on home and mother, thousands of miles across the waters, and it would be a sin to break in on this holy communion with loved ones far away. [Applause.]

The association is strictly nonsectarian, and there is no effort any where to promote creed or denominationalism. The major part of the work in France is educational, entertaining, religious, athletic, and personal service. More than 2,500,000 Bibles have been given away to soldiers. They were not forced upon them, but were given because the soldiers wanted them.

The work of the red triangle has a military value, recognized by Gens. Pershing, Foch, Diaz, Byng, Wood, and Kuhn, and by President Wilson and his Cabinet. Indeed, these people are a righteous force, sturdily helping to win a righteous war.

In London I visited Washington Inn, in St. James Square, an imposing Y. M. C. A. building, constructed so as to encircle the statue of William of Orange. I found it full of happy American soldiers, taking advantage of its good table and clean beds furnished at an extremely modest charge.

The manager of Eagle Hut, London, gave me his report for June, 1918, which I insert here, thinking this data might be of value. It reads as follows:

EAGLE HUT, JUNE, 1918.

Canteen: Meals served, 62,753; largest day, 2,372; pancakes, 11,545; soda fountain—drinks, 10,639; ice cream (started June 21), 3,799.

Domitories: men slept, 8,368; kits checked, 3,512; baths, 1,752.

Religious: Sunday meetings, 10; Thursday meetings, 4; attendance, 1,700. Five Sunday morning services in canteen. Good night, 28 services; Attendance, 216. Personal talks, 221.

Home corner: Visits and interviews, 168; sewings, 68; letters written, 35; letters received, 20.

Social: Entertainments, 23 held; attendance, 9,500. Theater parties, attendance, 1,728. Sightseers, 697. Hospitality (week-end parties, tea, dinner, and visits and tea on terrace of Houses of Parliament), attendance, 173. Socials, 4; attendance, 1,600. Billiards, 2,464 one-half hour games.

Information bureau: Queries answered, 4,827.

The Young Men's Christian Association should be encouraged here and by our soldiers overseas. It comes first in contact with the enlisted or drafted man, when he starts for camp or cantonment. It meets him and greets him when he arrives. It offers him a home, a club, a church, library, and writing room. It goes with him to the port when he takes ship for Europe. It accompanies him on the transport. It welcomes him on foreign soil. It keeps with him in rest camp, in billet, on the field, and if he is called upon to give up his young life in this most necessary and holy war, it gives him Christian burial. [Applause.]

THE PRESIDENT AND CABINET.

In Italy, France, and England, I am gratified to state that Secretaries Lansing, McAdoo, Baker, and Daniels are held in the highest esteem, and over there President Wilson is the man of the hour. His name is on the lip of everybody. Streets and squares have been named for him in all the capitals and in many other cities, camps, and villages. This great and popular patriot is deservedly recognized as the foremost man of all the world, the peerless leader in thought and action.

NATIONS NEW BORN.

I have spoken of the rebirth of certain men and women, caused by the quickening influences of this just war. Nations also have been born again, have thrown off the old and put on the new, have acquired vision and friendliness and soul values never before possessed. Germany, cold, proud, watchful, calculating, certain of her strength, thoroughly trained and ready, is alone responsible for the war. She critically took weight and measure as she thought of all the nations likely to oppose her. She considered Great Britain as indolent, trade loving, nonmilitant; France decadent; Italy flighty and frothy; Russia drink-besotted; America selfish and afraid. When these nations saw the Kaiser's real intentions they aroused themselves. They were reborn and rebaptized. Since this rebirth Germany found the English lion sharp of tooth and claw, France brave as of old, Italy aggressive and full of fight, Russia sober and deadly, until the sinister taint of Bolshevikism poisoned her blood and brain, and later, from Belleau wood to Berlin, she heard the fearless scream of the American Eagle rising above the rattle of rifles, the blast of shells, and the boom of cannon, proclaiming new ideals and a greater destiny for the stout young Republic, hitherto isolated and not ambitious for primacy in world politics.

It is inevitable now, as I see it, that we must prepare for our manifest destiny, acquire a great merchant marine, maintain with our real friends joint control of the seas, seek and obtain our share of foreign trade, become a world power, and continue a world power. The part that we are playing in this war will win for us a seat at the head of the peace-conference table. There we must take care of ourselves, punish Germany properly, and see that our friends get fair treatment. We have definitely and finally turned the tide of battle in favor of the allies. [Applause.]

Four times civilization has been saved during this struggle. Once by Belgium's brave resistance. Again by the French at the Marne in 1914, and again by England's navy. Finally by the American soldiers along the Marne in 1918. The American Army, as has been predicted, is playing the decisive rôle in this struggle and is a certain pledge of victory.

MEXICO.

A proper subject for discussion at the peace conference is, What shall be done with Mexico? If the Mexican Republic or the Mexican people continue to discriminate against our citizens, if those in authority persist in confiscating American property, if their bandits are permitted to carry on perennially the outrages, thefts, and murders against unoffending Americans as they have been doing for many years past, if Mexico is to be made the base for German intrigue and aggression against us, it may become desirable or necessary as a measure of self-defense for us to go to war with Mexico.

GERMANY.

May God punish Germany according to her deserts. For all the blood that has been shed, for the suffering undergone, for the colossal costs of this awful war, Germany and Germany alone is responsible. The murder on June 28, 1914, of Prince Ferdinand and his wife by an Austrian subject, Gavrillo Prinzip, on territory governed by the Austrian crown, merely furnished an excuse for the war. Prussian militarism actually caused it. Note what the half-mad Kaiser has cost the world in two items alone—men and money.

M. M. Barriol, the distinguished actuary, gives the following figures as the money value of a man: In the United States, $4,100; in Great Britain, $4,100; in Germany, $3,380; in France, $2,900; in Russia, $2,020; in Austria-Hungary, $2,020, or an average money value for the five foreign nations of $2,892.

The number of men already lost is 8,509,000 killed and 7,175,000 permanently disabled, a total of 15,684,000. Thus the world has been impoverished through the death and permanent disability of its young man power to the extent of $45,000,000,000, figuring only as a cold-blooded actuary figures, and leaving out every other element of value that can not be measured in money. Germany must answer for this. The war to date has cost the nations over $160,000,000,000 in expense money, and the blame for this expenditure is hers.

Germany's outrages and crimes, outside of her killings in war, are appalling. I have it on the authority of an Army chaplain, Rev. George A. Griffith, now serving in France as chaplain of the Fifth Field Artillery, the regiment that fired America's first shot in the war, that there are now in France little children with stumps of hands mutilated by Germans, young boys whose right hand fingers these brutes cut off. Four young Canadians were crucified by them, and an American soldier is said to have found his own brother that they had crucified. A great clergyman in Belgium said, "For the honor and peace of womanhood, I dare not put in print the outrages that I know Belgian women have undergone at the hands of German soldiers."

I talked with an Englishman at Southampton, who had spent several years in Germany before the war, and he told me something of the junkers back in Germany. He said that for many years these people have been thinking of, talking of, and preparing for this war. It was Bismark who decided to make Prussia the dominant state in Germany, then the ruler of Europe, and finally acquire for her the mastery of the world. They believe that war is a biological necessity. The militarists or junkers, he said, are noted for their cruelty, selfishness, and their blatant hypocrisy. They seldom practice honor and rarely keep faith with any one. They adhere to the philosophy that it does not pay to be honest. Their chief aim in life is self-indulgence. They are gluttons in eating and drinking, and in all vices. Indeed, they glory in vices and think it a manifestation of German forcefulness. With them, lying is a fine art and is practiced as a cult. Generally, they are ill mannered, cynical, egotistical, treacherous, ruthless, and insolent. One German typical of the ruling classes said: "I don't believe in God or in religion, but every night I go down on my knees and think over everything I have said or done during the day, and if I find I have said anything that did not further my own interests, I make a mental note of the circumstance and take care it never happens again. This is how I educate myself for the battle of life, to get the most out of it and to steal a march on the others." These are the kind of people we are fighting, and I for one am glad that we are fighting them on another continent and not on our own.

America kept out of the war as long as she decently could. President Wilson, peace loving, as our people are, was reluctant about getting into the struggle and properly so, but our country would have been a cringing cur among the nations of the earth had she not entered when she did. The traitors in Russia had sold their great country to the Kaiser, and had it not been for our entrance into the war Germany before this in all probability would have triumphed. She would have absorbed Russia and her iron heel would have rested heavily upon the neck of the world for a century.

I voted for war. I have done and shall continue to do all in my power to push it to a speedy and victorious conclusion. We are going to win. The initiative has passed to us. Marshal Foch has proven himself a brilliant strategist. The wisdom of vesting supreme command in him can not be questioned. Gen. Pershing has his confidence and is recognized as one of the greatest officers among the allies. Our commanding general sent this message to the American Government:

Furnish us the men, supplies, ships, and airplanes and we will win decisively in 1919.

NO PREMATURE PEACE.

We owe it to those who have given up their lives as a sacrifice to the right to make this a fight to the finish, and we can and will finish it next year. In order to do so we must continue to rush men and supplies to Europe. We should not give the central powers time to breathe, reorganize, and gather strength to leap at the throats of peaceful nations again in a few decades. Let us end Prussian militarism now, and that ended, the Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs will end also. We must obtain a decisive military victory. This is the greatest reward that we can offer for the gallant deeds of the dead, and it is the noblest monument that we can build to commemorate their sacrifices and achievements. They would be ashamed of us if we quit before Germany is soundly thrashed. We betray the dead if we allow the now cringing Hun, the late saber-rattling bully, to trick or whine us into a premature peace conference. [Applause.]

What would happen if the allied nations should now at Germany's instance meet for a peace discussion with the delegates from the central powers? By sitting down now at a peace table with her representatives we would have to admit that her delegates are as good as ours, and acknowledge that the outrages committed or condoned by her were not outrages at all. If we now begin to haggle with her diplomatic tricksters about peace terms, they certainly would not consent to be punished for their wrongdoing. Place a judge and a burglar upon equal terms and they would not likely agree as to what should be done with the burglar. [Applause.]

Germany is good at bargaining. She likes to swap things that she has no title to for something her antagonist owns. She considers that she is not bound by any promise. The allies probably have no statesmen hypocritical enough, abandoned enough, to render them fit persons to stand a chance of successfully haggling and negotiating with Germany. We can not match her for trickery and duplicity. If we agreed to a cessation of hostilities now and agreed to a peace discussion, the central powers would prolong it indefinitely and in the meantime they would be reorganizing their shattered forces. They would be trying to exploit and organize Russia for themselves. They would be attempting to create lassitude among our soldiers, forcing us to the expense of remaining in the field all the time, and, after weary months of wrangling, if she did not get a strong German peace or just what she wanted, she would throw down further negotiations and begin to fight again. We should beware of Prussian peace pitfalls. If the entente is to have a peace that will be lasting, it must be a peace dictated by us. Nor can we afford to leave our problems and differences to any mediator who might cause us to lose the ideals for which we are fighting. [Applause.]

A STRONG ALLIED PEACE.

Germany must get back or be driven back to her own place in the sun, Germany.

France must have Alsace and Lorraine and every square foot of the iron-ore field stolen from her in 1870–71.

Silesia, stolen by Frederick the Great from Austria, should be incorporated with a new free Polish State. The rich and powerful nations are and will be the nations with coal and iron. Germany with too much of both—that is to say, with Silesian coal and Lorraine iron ore—will be too powerful for the peace of the world.

The German people must learn from Germany's losses that it is unsafe to permit her militarists to wage offensive war and wars of conquest. So Germany must lose her colonies, already taken from her.

Patient, brave, suffering Belgium must be restored and her martyred people compensated for their losses.

Roumania must be reestablished.

Devastated Serbia must be rehabilitated.

The wrongs of Greece must be righted and her future made secure with the patriot Venizelos at least second in command of the ship of state.

Italy's dream must come true and she must have those areas where Italians predominate, including Trieste, and she must have a border that she can defend, instead of the border Bismarck compelled her to accept in the days of blood and iron.

As a great buffer state, serving to hold Prussian barbarism and junkerism in check, a great independent state must be formed for the Jugo-Slavs and those intrepid patriots, the Czech-Slovaks, now fighting with unprecedented heroism side by side with the military forces of the entente. This state will stand like a lion in the path between the central powers and the Pacific East.

The infamous scrap of paper called the peace of Brest-Litovsk, made by Prussian war lords with drawn swords in their hands and with Lenine and Trotsky with their hands behind them, must be torn up and spit upon, and the Russian Provinces stolen from Russia by this ill-smelling pact given back to Russia.

As a further block to Germany's unholy ambitions for eastern conquest Constantinople must go to the allied nations and be made a free port, the Dardanelles to be held open for the benefit of mankind. Nor should Turkey or Bulgaria be given any favors or concessions, for they deserve none.

Palestine, Syria, and Armenia must be taken away from Turkish rule and made secure.

America must be given a free hand to protect herself from Mexican aggression on her citizens or their property in or out of Mexico.

Germans after the war should not be allowed in the capacity of military instructors to their armies or as organizers of munition factories in any countries outside of her own borders. If this is allowed the militarists will be intriguing everywhere for another world war, as they did prior to this war.

The damage Germany has done should be assessed and paid, as far as it will go, out of German property in the allies' country and by paying damages in kind. This will render her less dangerous. She should hand over ship for ship destroyed by her commerce raiders and submarines; the machinery she has looted and destroyed in Belgium, northern France, Poland, and elsewhere should be replaced by her. She should, where practicable, pay goods for goods taken, and where she has exacted money fines she should be made to pay back in money.

In America all German traitors to our flag should be sent back to Germany, where they belong. If a man is once a traitor he rarely lives over the infection. Our naturalization laws should be remodeled, and Germans and other foreigners who have been pro-German or disloyal through this war should have their naturalization certificates annulled. [Applause.]

POST-BELLUM PROBLEMS.

We hear much about great changes that some prophets claim are to occur after the war. The older I get the more conservative I become. The world we live in is not such a bad old world. The God we worship is a wise and a beneficent God. Men and women under the old order of things have builded a wonderful civilization. It is by no means perfect, but I shall hate to see it destroyed or materially changed. Some changes are necessary and desirable, but God deliver us from red revolution, from the philosophy of those who are fluent in their recital of alleged ills, but who propose as a remedy the turbulent destruction of property rights. Deliver us from these people who proclaim that everything that is is wrong. We encounter at every corner men who seem not to live in the present. They toil not. They are brethren of sedentary habits. They stand to lose nothing because they have acquired nothing, but they profess to believe that we should reconstruct some shadowy old civilization said by them to be better than ours, or that we should reach out in anticipation a thousand years beyond our time and construct Utopian communities that are certain to fail in this day and generation. [Applause.]

We must not only destroy Prussianism, but we must avoid the greater evil—Bolshevikism. The last-named gentry have about run their inglorious course in afflicted Russia. They have feloniously taken most of the money out of the Russian banks. They have emptied all the wine cellars. They have murdered millions of their betters. They have done all in their power to deliver their country into the hands of Germany, and the economic theory that they have the right to rob every class but their own has proven its own folly. We will suppress I. W. W.ism. By this war we will abate Prussianism, we will escape Bolshevikism, and America and her allies will live together in a great, strong, peaceful, democratic brotherhood. Down with class tyranny and up with world democracy. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, at this time, when the world is bleeding from multiplied thousands of wounds; at this time, when one million and a half American boys are somewhere in or near where the conflict rages, an entire nation at home is united in its hopes and prayers for their success. Yesterday this House voted upon the most tremendous revenue bill that was ever prepared by any law-making body of any nation at any time. This bill includes in its scope of taxation every industry and practically all incomes. So wide is it in its scope that no man or woman, however rich or however poor, will escape it unaffected. Notwithstanding all of this, something that the world had never realized before, the complaints lodged against it are so few that they are not worthy the mention. Taking all of this into consideration, realizing its strain upon the purse strings of every individual in America, it argues well for the loyalty of the country and it is a cause for congratulation that there was not a single vote cast against this measure in this branch of Congress.

It is the evidence of the determination of the American people to win this war and count the cost in money when peace at last has come again.

At this time there is only one thought in the minds of the American people, and that is that the business of the world to-day is war and the purpose of the United States, in conjunction with the allied countries of Europe, is to win the war. This purpose was again reiterated by the President of the United States within the week, when he sent his brief and emphatic reply to the suggestion of the Austrian Government that a peace conference on neutral soil be held. This answer of the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy found a responsive chord in the hearts of all America. This was a restatement of the proposition that the business of the world to-day is war and that the fight will continue until the German horde shall be stopped in its mad rush against the civilization of the world. I do not know and you do not know how long this will take, but we do know that it is going to require the full man power of this country on Europe's battle fields, and, too, it is going to require every ounce of energy that is left at home.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of America is and will be to fight until the only move the German Government can make will be a sincere move for peace, and peace, too, that will mean an absolute security for all the nations of the world, big and little. No one knows how long this will take. The guess of the schoolboy is just as good as the guess of the greatest military genius in Berlin or Paris or London or Washington. It may be this year; it may be next year. These boys over there, we are told, are anxious to fight until Germany lays down her arms, and then they are going to say to her: "Never again shall you attempt to crucify the nations of the world upon your cross of iron." No; no one knows how long this is going to take, but we do know that the future peace and happiness and security of the world are now in good and safe hands—in the hands of the American boys. And I do not think that they can ever be persuaded to quit until they plant the Stars and Stripes upon the ramparts of the world's freedom.

We have all so often heard it said that Germany has been preparing for this war for 40 years. That is nothing. The United States has been preparing for this war three times 40 years. It is true that Germany has been indulging in the grim practice of building monstrous guns and every other device known to man for the taking of human life. On the other hand, America has been building schoolhouses and churches and has been planting them thick in every city and town and village and hamlet, and on every hillside, and in every valley throughout the entire country. In this way she has been training her boys and girls for peace, but when war comes they have been trained to lay down their implements of peace and take up the armament of war. In this conflict that is now raging in all of its hideous profusion intellect is going to win. The American boys have thus been trained in these great democratic institutions in a way that the soldiers of no other country have ever been trained. Before this war England and Germany could boast of their great colleges of learning where royalty was trained, but the great public-school systems of most of the States of this Union have been the astonishment of the world. In these schools boys and girls in every station of life have been trained side by side. They have been taught the same lessons; they are imbued with the same ideas; they are the soldiers of the only country that from its birth has declared that "all men are created free and equal." I do not want to detract in any way from the courage of the soldiers of any other nation engaged with America in this great struggle for national existence. I shall not. But all of America could not help but experience a thrill of patriotic pride a few weeks ago when an American officer, refusing to obey the commands of a superior foreign officer, ordered a counter charge in which the German forces were driven back. Ever since that moment the German Army has turned its face from the west toward home. And if I should be allowed to venture a guess, I would say they will never stop in this drive until Berlin is reached, perhaps destroyed. These boys will not agree to a premature peace.

When this time has come peace will follow. It will then be such a peace that will leave to the people of every nation the right to choose what path they shall follow. No man or set of men should have the right to determine for another citizenship a form of government under which it should live. This is far from the object of this war. We in America believe that the only righteous form of government is a democracy, where the people rule, but if another people want an autocratic form of government that is their concern and not ours. The President has said that this is a war to "make the world safe for democracy." He has also said that when peace comes "each nation must be left to decide for itself on its form of government." So this war, then, is one in which the entente powers are seeking to make the world a safe place in which the people of all governments may live in happiness.

There is much criticism to-day about criticism of war plans. A criticism that would tear down and at the same time blaze the way for a better and surer victory should not be withheld. A criticism that destroys and at the same time offers nothing better is treason against the American boys in uniform. These young men from every neighborhood throughout the United States are fighting your battles and mine. The great throbbing heart of the American people is with them in their every effort. Men may attempt to seek political advantage on the floor of this House in speech or otherwise, but the relatives of these boys and their friends have very little sympathy for such attempts to gain a personal or political advancement. Men outside of Congress, who are out of office and want in, often stoop low and adopt the most un-American tactics to beguile the thought of the American people from the great battle line in Europe to their own campaigns. The partisan political shyster will try to create dissension at home where there is no dissension, will try to plant suspicion of disloyalty in the minds of the electorate when the fact remains that there is no disloyalty in the ranks of Americans. All have one aim and one purpose, and that is to back to the limit every boy who wears the American uniform. These political pirates who cry disloyalty are agents of the Kaiser. In their efforts to bring political preferment to themselves they will fail, and only Germany will take notice of what they say.

Germany may be led to believe from their rantings that there is a division of opinion in this country as to the prosecution of this war. The opinion is unanimous, despite the hysteria of the office seeker and his friends, that this fight shall continue until there is a peace with a decided victory.

As I said before, this is the most stupendous revenue bill that has just passed that ever burdened the people of any nation; yet I am frank to say that I do not believe any of us much care about the amount in money this war is going to cost if it will only in the end bring back the boys who have left their homes in every community throughout this entire country. That is the thought uppermost in my mind to-day.

In this connection I am glad to be able to say that prior to this war I voted for every measure proposed that looked to the increasing of either the Army or the Navy; every proposal that tended toward a preparedness for this country received my vote. I might add that I voted against every proposal before we entered this conflict that tended to draw us into the vortex of this great struggle. Beginning with the declaration of war, for which I voted, down to the present moment I, in company with most of you, have voted for every measure relating to this war that has been urged by the administration. I will continue to follow this course as long as I have a voice and seat in this body. I have always believed in national preparedness for this country, and I believe in it yet. Before this war was declared I was only anxious for a preparedness as a security against war. And when we come out of this conflict of blood I would like to see the United States so armed that no hostile nation will ever dare venture near our shores. Of course I would like to see a disarmament of the world, but until that time comes I do not want to see this country throw away her guns. If all the other nations of the world are willing for disarmament when peace is finally come, then let it be simultaneous the world over.

Mr. Chairman, of course I do not favor a preparedness of this character because I want war. I advocate it because I do not want war to ever again spread its mantle of desolation over the world. War leaves in its awful wake death and destruction. It bows the head of a nation in deep and lasting sorrow. It strikes a deadly blow at civilization. Yet with all war's horrors, and with all of its miseries, in its ever onward march, civilization has not yet reached the point where it settles all of its disputes by peaceful and orderly methods. But on the other hand, each year invention gives to the world other weapons much more horrible and deadly than did the preceding year. To-day the inventive genius of all mankind is working overtime to give to the world additional weapons for the taking of human life.

Many profess to believe that this conflict will spell the end of war. All right thinking men hope and pray that this prophecy is true, but some without yet knowing what problems the world will face when peace shall again show her welcome smile, are demanding that the United States shall be the first great nation to disarm. These men and women are no doubt good, conscientious, loyal citizens, just as much interested in the welfare of this Nation as you or I, but I can not help but think that many of them are the same men and women who before the war commenced in Europe were predicting that war had deserted the world forever. So sure were they that the dogs of war had been so securely chained that they could never break their fetters, that they had even coaxed the dove of peace to build her nest and hatch her brood in the very mouths of cannon that to-day are belching forth a destruction to the enemies of the world.

Mr. Chairman, it is therefore early to talk about a disarmament for America alone. We must first know the problems that will confront us when that time comes. I sometimes fear there may be future wars. I hope not. Remembering only the past, we know that war has been present ever since time began. Away back yonder when the world was new, down to the present time, there has never been an age in which some country has not been grappling at the throat of some other country in a death struggle for national supremacy. Man in his primitive state fought with clubs. And as time went on he employed other crude instruments with which to wage battle against the enemy until, finally, gunpowder made the rifle possible. Then came the cannon for longer range on both land and sea.

But to-day the awful instruments of death have revolutionized modern warfare. These instruments have crazed the civilized world. Ships, larger and more impregnable, armed with guns so mighty and so deadly that they defy distance and resistance, plow the seas. To-day great armies of men composed of not thousands but millions, tramp the surface of the earth, armed with guns big and little, guns that throw lead and steel and fire and choking gas into the throats of contending armies. To-day great monsters of the sea, whale-like, swim far under the surface and rising unnoticed, hurl for miles deadly torpedoes that, striking a vulnerable spot of some other great monster that rides the waves, it goes down to the bottom of the sea, forever lost. But, to-day, man is not content to fight on land and on and under sea, but he flies miles high above the surface of the earth, and from his mighty ship that sails the air drops death and destruction down upon the heads of armies and spires of cities, death and destruction that put the very thunderbolts of Jove to shame.

Yet this is modern warfare. This is science battling science. This is the mind of man run riot.

Yet this is the kind of hell into which we have invited the American boy to go, with the hope and firm conviction that out of it all he can point the way to a higher and better and safer civilization for the peoples of the world.

Mr. Chairman, this being his task, we are performing but a small duty when without a dissenting voice we vote money unlimited to support him in his unselfish work in his supreme devotion to his country's cause. The man who would do less has no place in the greatest lawmaking body in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say now that I wish to proceed for 25 minutes without interruption.

Since the House has listened to these patriotic addresses, I hardly expected to be favored with such a large attendance, and I want to thank the Members of the House for waiting until the first speaker who discusses the subject of the bill.

This is the annual Agricultural appropriation bill, which was vetoed by the President.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is an important measure, and I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. CRISP having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SISSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called and 261 Members answered to their names, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

EMERGENCY WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield one minute?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read a letter from the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 21 September, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: In view of the possibility of three-day adjournments by the House and the absence of a quorum from the city, I venture to write you this hurried note to urge that the emergency power bill be pressed to passage, if possible, before adjournment, as it is of capital and immediate importance as a war measure. I hope that it will be possible for you to obtain the consent of the House to this action.

In haste,
Cordially and sincerely yours,
(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. My time is up.

Mr. NORTON. Did the gentleman ask the President to write that letter?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer all questions when the bill is under consideration.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 12714).

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the $2.40 wheat having been eliminated by the veto and the 1917 crop having been sold and the 1918 crop largely sold, it is unnecessary to say anything about that question except to say that the wheat raisers of the Northwest patriotically accepted the action of the President, and they also accept loyally the announcement of the guaranty for the 1919 crop at slightly increased prices, being assured by the President in his proclamation on that subject that through a commission of inquiry he will determine what shall be a fair price for that crop.

In view of the fact that last year's price was fixed after inquiry and that that was planted and harvested under conditions that were more favorable, so far as expense is concerned, to the farmer than it will be for the next crop, the farmers of the Northwest feel assured that the price to be ultimately fixed will approximate the price contended for in Congress. It certainly will cost 10 per cent more to produce next year's crop than last year. Scarcity of labor alone will make a difference of that. If $2.20 was fair for 1917, $2.50 will be fair for 1919. The only complaint that I have heard has been that the price-fixing authority has not also been extended to those things that the farmer has to buy.

The farmers of the Northwest also yield patriotically to the war necessity of fixing the price of the wool they raise, and they look with favor upon the announcement carried in this morning's papers that the President is going to fix a fair price on cotton, also. Some of them were beginning to feel that they were discriminated against as a section, and they are glad to learn now the intention of the administration to at least go as far as fixing the price of cotton, which largely enters into the expense of every family and is also a war necessity.

This bill carries $27,000,000 for the purpose of encouraging agriculture, and it is important for Congress to know whether or not the purposes of the bill have been fully accomplished. I want to call attention to-day to one feature of the administration of the laws governing the Department of Agriculture which has been, as we believe, faulty. Some years ago the demand came from the people of the Northwest—from North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota—for Federal grain standards. These grain standards, so far as wheat was concerned, were put into effect by the Secretary of Agriculture at the beginning of the marketing of the last year's crop. Much was hoped for that scientific system devised by the Department of Agriculture for grading grain, it had cost a lot of money for preparatory work. It was perhaps unfortunate that simultaneously with the enforcement of the grain standards act, so far as wheat was concerned, the food-control act went into effect, and under that authority the price of wheat was fixed according to the grades of the Federal standards. Had the people known of the effect that that would have upon the price to the farmer they would have protested, but no one realized the importance of it until it was too late.

Now, those people who have been led to believe that the farmer really received the price fixed by the President for wheat without deduction are mistaken, for when the Food Administration act went into effect the whole business was revolutionized. The first action taken was to make it certain that the grades determined the absolute price. On top of that the Government raised the commission to be paid by the farmer to the man who sells his wheat—the commission man—from what it had been for 50 years, namely, 1 cent a bushel, to 1 per cent. In ordinary times the price of wheat made no difference. The commission was 1 cent a bushel. But now it was more than doubled. If the farmer shipped directly to the Food Administration Grain Corporation he was charged 1 per cent, or 2¼ cents. If he shipped to a commission house it was the same. That was a deduction from the fixed price of 1¼ cents.

The commission man who sold the grain had nothing to do. He could not get a better price on behalf of the farmer who produced the wheat. That was fixed. The 1 cent a bushel was formerly earned by the diligent salesman who showed the intending buyer the intrinsic merits of the wheat. But here there was no possibility of getting any other price than that determined by the grade.

No. 1 was fixed; No. 2, 3 cents less; No. 3, 6 cents less; and No. 4, 10 cents less, and so on. Now, had these grades been such as to have been tested by experience, it might not have been as disastrous to the farmer as it turned out to be; but they were the most complicated grades that were ever devised, and the rules were so strict that at every turn the farmer was penalized. For each grade there was the requirement that it must be bright in color. It must have no admixture of other wheat, not even to the extent of 1 per cent of other varieties of wheat. It must have a test weight, in the case of No. 1, of 59 pounds. It must have a moisture test of not to exceed 13½ per cent. It must have only one-fourth of 1 per cent of damaged kernels, or of heat-damaged kernels. It must have less than one-half of 1 per cent of inseparable material.

Then there were certain rules in regard to dockage, which compelled the giving away of the valuable dockage that there was in the grain. For instance, if you shipped a carload—and I am speaking of actual cases—a carload of wheat containing 25 bushels of flax mixed with the wheat, which could not be separated, except by machinery, and that flax was worth $3 a bushel, or $75 in a car of a thousand bushels of wheat, yet the buyer of the wheat got that for nothing, and the freight was paid on it, the same as on dirt. No matter what the value of the dockage was, you could not receive pay for that. So the farmers were compelled to give away all the valuable dockage, amounting in the aggregate to millions.

Plump, good wheat, raised on new soil, usually weighs from 60 to 61 pounds per bushel. The requirement of No. 1 was 59 pounds. Here is a farmer who ships in his wheat that weighs 60 or 61 pounds to the bushel.

But the next requirement is that it must have a moisture test of 13½ per cent. If your wheat has 13.6 per cent of moisture, down it goes to grade No. 2. There might be a carload of wheat that would have all that is required under the first requirement and under the second and under the third. It might have some damaged kernels, although it met the other requirements, and then it would go down to No. 2. Or if it had more moisture than 15 per cent it would go down to No. 4, and then the farmer would lose 10 cents a bushel.

And so on with the inseparable material to the end of these six requirements. The result of that was that the farmer was punished when his wheat went below the standard fixed, but he was never rewarded when it went above. For instance, John Doe ships a carload of wheat that weighs 60 pounds to the bushel. Richard Roe, another farmer, ships wheat of the same variety that weighs 58½ pounds to the bushel. That wheat is graded as No. 2, because one-half pound short on test weight. A man who buys these two cars has only to put them together, and then he has all No. 1.

To illustrate further: Here is one car that has the first requirement—it is bright, cool, and sweet; (2) it has no admixture of other wheat; (3) it has only 12 per cent moisture; (4) it has a test weight of 60 pounds; (5) it contains no damaged kernels; (6) but it contains three-tenths of 1 per cent of cockle or vetch and therefore grades No. 2. Here is another car, just the same, but without any weed seeds, but it has one-tenth of 1 per cent of heat-damaged kernels, and it grades No. 2. Here is another car that more than complies with all the requirements, except that it has 13.6 per cent of moisture. Here is another that fulfills all the requirements, the same as the others, but weighs only 58½ pounds, test weight. Here is another that more than fulfills all the requirements, the same as the others also, but it has 1 per cent of red durum wheat, and it is graded No. 2. Mix these six cars together and it will be all No. 1, a gain of $180 on the six cars for a mixing which in a modern elevator can be done in a few minutes. And so throughout the whole list. You can take wheat that meets with these six requirements, six different samples, and they may be higher, and by mixing you can make No. 1, or you may make No. 1 out of No. 4.

The result was that the elevators of Minneapolis became the paradise of the mixer, and he could make sometimes $100 and sometimes $200 on one carload by simply mixing two together. Now, how absurd it is if one man can do this. You see, these grades were fixed absolutely to punish anyone who slightly came below the mark, but would not reward one who exceeded it. These grades were more strict, and there were more classes and more grades to each class, nearly twice over, than there were under the old system in Minnesota, which had given pretty good satisfaction apparently for more than 20 years. There were so many excuses under which the wheat could be graded down that the farmer actually realized only about 90 or 95 per cent of the price to which he was entitled, and he lost on the average at least 10 cents a bushel in addition to the extra charge that he had to pay for commission.

Now you can see that these rules must have been framed without reference to the fact that the grade fixed the price, because if that had been taken into account they would have been modified so as to allow something when the particular wheat excelled the requirements of the grade. I have in my office samples sent me by the Board of Grain Appeals of Minnesota, from Minneapolis, samples that any novice, any man who knows the difference between wheat and barley, can tell, graded No. 4, but which is better than No. 1, or at least as good. That results from the fact that a slight variation of one-tenth of 1 per cent in these requirements runs it down, although it may be plump and hard and sweet and vitreous, and all that, for the purpose of making flour, for making bread. The wheat that in these samples is graded No. 4 excells the higher grades. The object of grades, of course, should be to reflect the milling value, the value for food. Now, if they had anticipated that this would be the result, some modification would have been made or should have been made of the grade, because when the grade did not fix the price the wheat, so far as these primary markets were concerned, like Minneapolis, was sold by sample, and the mistake of the grade was corrected by the bidder. Wheat that had been stacked and sent out dry without any rain on it the bidder could tell, without any chemical analysis, was dry; that it carried perhaps only 12 per cent of moisture. In Minneapolis you could see hundreds of men on the board of trade, each man with a little table, all struggling, in ordinary times, to show that wheat that had been graded No. 2 was actually better than some No. 1, because it was so dry, or had such a plump kernel, and was such a high-test wheat per bushel, and the miller knew that it was true. Now, take it as to the moisture test. The ordinary man, of course, will know that moisture means water, and that if there is 1 per cent more of water in the wheat there is less substance for making flour; consequently, 1 per cent would deteriorate the value of the wheat for making flour about 2¼ cents per bushel.

Of course, we all understand that wheat must have moisture in it. In order to grind wheat it is necessary to dampen it to 15 per cent moisture. Flour itself usually contains 14½ per cent. When all moisture is extracted it undergoes such a chemical change that it ceases to be wheat. The dryest wheat that is ever shipped perhaps contains from 11 to 12 per cent of moisture. Now, if the miller buys that wheat, he allows for that, and if it is graded low for some other reason, he pays an extra price on that sample. In fact, that was the business of the men on the board of trade in these primary markets, to show the merits of that particular wheat, regardless of grade, and it was a common thing to see that No. 1, for instance, sold for 5 cents more and some for 6 cents more than the regular price of No. 2 wheat and some sold at the No. 1 price. So you see that the mistake of inspection was automatically corrected. But when the fixed grades and prices came the farmer suffered. The Government took from the farmer that which was simply up to standard and nothing more, and the miller bought that which was the cream of the market and made a profit. Hence, you will find that under crop year 1917 the millers made enormous profits and so did the elevators. Now, the profit of the elevators and millers, as far as that is concerned, in that year did not go to reduce the cost of living. It was clean velvet to them, because the consumer was charged a price for the flour that was based upon the high price of the wheat.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply want to ask the gentleman whether or not in the primary markets at St. Paul and Minneapolis you have State inspection, or is it Federal inspection of which you are complaining?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is Federal inspection. That has superseded the State inspection. Now, these results caused great dissatisfaction among the farmers, who said that these grades were framed by men who did not realize practical conditions; that they were framed by men who did not realize that the elevators in the country towns had but few bins, so that they could not keep step with all these numerous classes and subclasses and grades, and that they would be mixed, anyway, and the farmer penalized for the mixing. They complained, and they had 18 or 19 different hearings before the Chief of the Bureau of Markets, and hardly anybody at all defended the grades, except a few millers and a few elevator men and mixers in the large centers. But instead of listening to the farmers, to the producers of the wheat, the Agricultural Department absolutely refused to do anything. Then the farmers sent delegations here from South Dakota and North Dakota and Minnesota, their State officers, their public-safety commissions. Representatives of the State government called on the congressional delegations here, and we all went to the Department of Agriculture first and stated our grievances without avail. Then we went to the White House and presented them there without avail.

Then we asked for a remedy for this defect in the administration of the law. I want to emphasize here that Congress has been blamed for this result; that the farmers have been defrauded out of a large part of the price that the administration had guaranteed them because of the passage of the grain-standard act. That has been a common complaint.

I have tried to point out that the fault was not in the law, but was in administering it and fixing the grades, and the grievance could have been remedied any time by the authority that caused it.

We came to Congress, introduced bills—my colleague, Mr. ANDERSON, a member of the Committee on Agriculture, introduced a bill and I introduced a bill—to see if we could not get the farmers represented on the board fixing the grain standard. We had a short hearing before the Committee on Agriculture, but it was postponed and never has been heard of since. So, in behalf of the farmers of Minnesota and the Northwest, I want to enter my protest against this treatment. We have exhausted every remedy in appealing to the administrative authorities and tried our best to get relief by legislation, but we have failed.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The gentleman says he had a short hearing before the Agricultural Committee. Did not the gentleman have all the hearings that he desired before that committee?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I have been asking for hearings, but the chairman was absent and I could not get one.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I do not think anybody refused the gentleman a hearing; he appeared once or twice before the committee.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, we have had no action on the bill; that is sure. I want to say that if the Republicans were in control of this House and the gentleman from Mississippi should come before me as a member of the Committee on Agriculture or before this House and ask me to help him because the enforcement of the cotton-standard act was onerous and unfair to the cotton producers, I would guarantee that I would give him a sympathetic ear and try to remedy the trouble. We have complained of the administration of the grain-standard act, we have complained to the executive authorities and to Congress repeatedly, not only through the Members of Congress but through the constituted State authorities, and have had no satisfaction except to this extent:

The food administration has given some relief as to these grades, and I congratulate the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and others who went to Mr. Hoover and protested against the tyranny of the agricultural chief of the Bureau of Markets in this matter.

When Mr. H. N. Owen, publisher of Farm, Stock, and Home, the leading agricultural paper in the Northwest, complained to Mr. Hoover of the injustice of this operation against the farmers, Mr. Hoover said, "I know the grades are wrong, you need not tell me, because I have $500,000 in cash in my treasury which I gained because the grades which I sold at were better than the grades I bought at, and I do not know what to do with the money."

Now, that was not confidential. He bought about ninety million bushels of wheat, and the grades turned out so much more favorable to him that, as he said, he had a half a million dollars. If he was ahead a half a million dollars, how much were the mixers in Minneapolis ahead? Five or six times more, because Mr. Hoover's purchase was of the wheat that just came up to the standard, while the millers got the cream of the business.

I repeat, that if a similar situation had existed in the administration of the cotton-standard act, notwithstanding there is no cotton raised in my district, I should have been glad to join in procuring a remedy of faulty administration that resulted in depriving the honest farmer who labors and tills the soil producing both cotton and wheat.

What was the relief that was granted, so far as this year's crop is concerned. The relief was very simple. Mr. Hoover simply ordered the grain corporation to permit competitive bidding, provided the millers charged $10.01 for the flour.

That has restored competitive bidding at the market in Minneapolis to the extent that this limitation upon the price of flour will permit, and the loss by faulty grading has been to that extent diminished. What I have said about the variation in the real milling value of the same grade of wheat is well illustrated in the clipping from the market reports in the Minneapolis Journal of September 18 last, which follows:

CASH SALES SEPTEMBER 18.

Wheat: No. 1 dark northern, 8 cars, $2.24½; 5, $2.25; 3, $2.24; 1, $2.20. No. 1 northern, 7 cars, $2.17; 7, $2.18; 2, $2.18; 2, $2.15; 1, $2.18; 1, $2.19; 1, $2.14½; pt., $2.21; 51, $2.21; 1, 2.22½. No. 1 red, 2 cars, $2.17; 1, $2.16. No. 2 dark northern, 1 car, $2.23; 1, $2.19; No. 2, northern, 1 car $2.13; 2, $2.11; 1, $2.10½; 4, $2.18; 2, $2.19; 1, $2.12½. No. 3 northern, 1 car, $2.18; 3, $2.07; 2, $2.14½; 1, $2.16; 1, $2.15. No. 4 northern, 1 car, $2.02; 1, $2.13. No. 5 northern, 1 car, $2.07; 1, $2.07. No. 2 mixed, 1 car, $2.09½. No. 1 mixed, 1, $2.20; 1, $2.20½; 1, $2.20. Corn: No. 3 yellow, 2 cars, $1.65; No. 6 yellow, 1, $1.58.

Oats: No. 3 white, 1 car, 67c.; 2, 70½c.; 1, 69½c.; sample grade, 1, 70c.; No. 4 white, 1, 68½c.; No. 3 white, 2, 69½c.; No. 4 white, 3, 69c.; No. 3 white, 2, 70½c.; standard white, 1, 71½c.; mixed grade, 1, 68c.; No. 3 white, 2,000 bu., 70c.; 1 car, 70c.; No. 4 white, 1, 70c.; 1, 69½c.; 1, 68½c.; 1, 68½c.; 1, 68c.

Rye: No. 1, 5 cars, $1.59½; No. 2, 15, $1.59½; No. 1, 2, $1.59½; No. 3, 1, $1.58; No. 1, 1, $1.59½; No. 2, 6, $1.59½; No. 1, 1, $1.59½; No. 2, 1, $1.59; No. 1, 2, $1.59½; No 2, 3, $1.59½; 1, $1.64; 1, $1.59½.

Flax: No. 1, 2,100 bu., $4.30; 1,200, $4.25; 1 car, $4.20; 1,000 bu., $4.23; 1,250, $4.24½; 1 car, $4.32; 550 bu., $4.23.

Barley: No. 4, 3 cars, 94.c; 3, 96c.; No. 5, 2, 91½c.; 1, 92½c.; sample grade, 1, 86c.; No. 5, 1, 94c.; 1, 92c.; 1, 91c.; 1, 93c.; sample, 1, 88c.; 8, 92c.; 12, 94c.; 2, 93½c.; 2, 96c.; 5, 93c.; 5, 90c.; 1, 93c.; 4, 91c.; 1, 97c.; 2, 95c.

It will be seen that there is a difference of several cents in different numbers of cars of the same grade of wheat, owing to the fact that the grade did not represent the true milling value of the wheat, and the miller or mixer who bought it knew it and paid the price. This limited competition at Minneapolis, however, does not help the small farmer who can not ship his grain directly to that market. This competition does not extend to the country. The country shipper has still to depend on the grade, and the grade fixes the price as above.

While we have been able to get this small concession from the Food Administration, we have not been able to get any substantial relief from the Department of Agriculture. After all the hearings and all the agitation the Chief of the Bureau of Markets last spring issued what he called "tentative grades" and ordered a hearing at Minneapolis thereon. These tentative grades were quite an improvement, in the opinion of the wheat growers, over the old ones. The farmers came by the hundreds from the Northwest to the Minneapolis hearings, including the commissioner of agriculture of North Dakota, Mr. Hagen, but when the new grades were announced there were but very slight changes made in the old ones. Mr. Hagen wrote to the Chief of the Bureau of Markets and complained that the promised relief in the tentative grades had been withdrawn, and the Chief of the Bureau of Markets wrote him a letter defending the new grades. Thereupon the Public Safety Commission of Minnesota took a hand and wrote a letter to Mr. Brand, the Chief of the Bureau of Markets, which I will print at the end of my remarks here in the RECORD. This letter completely answers Mr. Brand's contentions and shows up the opportunities for undue profits on the part of the grain trade at the expense of the farmers.

Last month, while I was home during the recess, I went to Minneapolis to inquire into the administration of the grain-standards act, and spent two days there. I visited the laboratories of the Grain Inspection Service, the offices of the Federal Grain Board of Appeals, and I went with the inspectors into the grain cars and saw them take out samples. I visited the board of trade, where the sales are actually made. I examined the model flour mill and bakery where the milling and bread-making value of the different wheats were tested. While I was there I was called to St. Paul to attend a conference at the governor's office to consider the complaints of the administration of the Federal grain-standards act. It seems that an agitation had been started to reestablish the old Minnesota grades and inspection in intrastate grain traffic. The Secretary of Agriculture had written to the governor protesting against it and suggesting a conference to adjust the differences. The governor had called in the chief inspectors of Duluth and Minneapolis and the members of the boards of grain appeals of those places and the public-safety commission. As a result of these deliberations a special committee, consisting of the members of the two boards of grain appeals, was appointed to consider the amendments to the Federal grain grades that should be proposed on behalf of the State. This committee reported, and the governor transmitted the proposed changes, which I will also insert in the RECORD. It will thus be seen that every effort has been made to obtain relief from the Department of Agriculture. Judging from our past treatment, however, we have very little hope of any results.

I have called attention to these grievances at this time because this very bill contains an appropriation of over $2,000,000 for the Bureau of Markets and $456,000 for the enforcement of the grain-standards act, and I want to give fair warning now that if this bureau continues its unjust treatment of the wheat raisers of the Northwest, we will have something to say when the next appropriation for this bureau comes up.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
St. Paul, September 11, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES J. BRAND,
Chief of Bureau of Markets, Washington, D. C.

Re modifications of grain standards for wheat.

MY DEAR MR. BRAND: Adverting to your telegram of August 16, I write to advise no action was taken at that time with respect to the adoption of Minnesota grades for Minnesota, but as a result of said meeting the following changes and modifications in grade standards have been suggested to me as advisable:

1. That the subclass red spring wheat be eliminated.
2. That the qualification "bright" for grade No. 1 be eliminated in the hard red spring and durum classes, except in the subclasses dark northern spring and amber durum.
3. That grade No. 5 be eliminated in the hard red spring and durum classes.
4. That the test weight per bushel of No. 4 dark northern spring be changed to 51 pounds, and that of grades Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, northern spring, to 57, 56, 54, and 50 pounds, respectively, and that of No. 4 durum to 52 pounds.
5. That in the hard red spring and durum classes the percentage of moisture permitted be increased to 15 per cent in all grades from 1 to 4, inclusive; and that all wheat containing more than 15 per cent moisture be classed as damp, but otherwise graded as qualified, with statement of the percentage of moisture; in other words, that it be graded in the same manner as smutty wheat.
6. That in the hard red spring and durum classes the percentage of rye permitted in grades Nos 1, 2, 3, and 4 be fixed as 2, 3, 5, and 7, respectively; and the percentage of foreign material, except rye, be fixed at 1, 2, 3, and 5, respectively, of which not more than one-half, 1, 2, and 4, respectively, may be other than cereal grain.
7. That in the hard red spring and durum classes the total percentage of damaged kernels in grades Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 be fixed at 2, 4, 10, and 15, respectively; of which not more than two-tenths, one-half, 1, and 2 may consist of heat-damaged kernels.
8. That in the hard red spring and durum classes the percentage of other wheats in grades Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 be fixed at 5, 10, 10, and 10, respectively, of which not more than 2, 5, 10, and 10 may be common white or white club.
9. That dockage be required to be divided into two classes, cereal grains and flaxseed, to be designated as class No. 1; all other dockage as class No. 2.

A table has been prepared showing more succinctly the changes so suggested.

Kindly let me hear from you as to what it is possible to do in connection with the proposed modifications.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) J. A. A. BURNQUIST,
Governor of Minnesota.

[Copy of a letter to Hon. Charles J. Brand, Chief of Bureau of Markets, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., answering his letter to the commissioner of agriculture of the State of North Dakota, known as "Service and Regulatory Announcement No. 34."]

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 12, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES J. BRAND,
Chief of Bureau of Markets,
United States Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As farmers and wheat producers, we have read and considered with much interest your letter of May 16, 1918, to the commissioner of agriculture of North Dakota, which letter you publish and distribute as "Service and Regulatory Announcements No. 34." It appears to have been written in reply to a letter of the North Dakota commissioner, in which he criticizes the issuing of "Service and Regulatory Announcements No. 32," on March 5, 1918, a tentative revision of the official Federal grain standards for wheat, and thereafter on April 15, 1918, after five public hearings on said proposed standards, the issuing and promulgating through the Secretary of Agriculture of "Service and Regulatory Announcements No. 33" as the official grain standards for wheat effective July 15, 1918. We have made a somewhat careful comparison of the standards set forth in the document numbered 32, the proposed standards, and those in No. 33, the standards adopted, and we are as much surprised as the North Dakota commissioner to find that very slight changes have been made from the old Federal standards of 1917, not enough to afford any substantial relief from the injustices of the old standards, which were justly complained of by all the producers. We are still more surprised to find that, with a few practically insignificant exceptions, none of the charges proposed in the tentative standards have been adopted.

You can not but admit that the Federal standards of 1917 were unjust and resulted in almost universal dissatisfaction to the producers. Mr. Livingston, of your department, stated at the public hearing on the tentative grades held at Indianapolis on March 16, 1918:

"Complaints came from all parts of the United States regarding all classes of wheat. The least complaint was in the Pacific Northwest, but complaints have come from all the territory east of the Rocky Mountains, and they came principally from country grain dealers and producers."

He made the further statement:

"We formulated the grades which are now in effect, and when fixed prices and other war measures came in we received complaints from everybody except the millers."

We understand these complaints, admittedly well founded, were the very reason why the tentative standards in No. 34 were put forth, but it now appears they were not adopted and that the old standards on which these complaints were made are practically all left in force. If the producers and smaller grain dealers were not satisfied before, it follows that they are not satisfied now. If they had just cause for complaint under former conditions, as you appear to have recognized, why should they not still be complaining? You ask, "Have the farmers been given a square deal in the Federal standards for Hard Red Spring Wheat?" Your own department appears to have conceded that they were not given a square deal under the 1917 grades. As they are given the same deal now, you appear to have answered your own question in the negative. But to give you the benefit of the farmers' and smaller grain dealers' answer to your question, we will state that an inquiry was addressed by the chief grain inspector of Minnesota to all of the local warehouses and country mills in the State, 809 in number, asking how many favored the Federal grades and how many favored the old Minnesota grades, with the following result:

Warehouses.	Number favoring Federal grades.	Number favoring Minnesota grades.	Number noncommittal.	Percentage favoring Federal grades.	Percentage favoring Minnesota grades.	Noncommittal.
Line houses	13	81	.....	13.8	86.2	.....
Farmers' houses	59	243	.....	19.5	80.5	.....
Country mills	65	65	.....	50	50	.....
Independent houses	45	213	.....	17.4	82.6	.....
Noncommittal	.....	.....	25	.....	.....	.....
Total	182	602	25	.....	.....	.....
Total percentages	.....	.....	.....	22.5	74.4	3.1

The following is an expression of opinion from 661 local warehousemen in the State of North Dakota in relation to the present Federal grain grades:

Houses.	Favoring Federal grades.	Favoring Minnesota grades.	Total houses.	Percentage favoring Federal grades.	Percentage favoring Minnesota grades.
Farmers, cooperative, and independent houses	195	466	661	29.5	70.5

In your letter to the North Dakota commissioner you say:

"I regret that the farmers of North Dakota, or any other farmers, were led to expect any particular standards. The department at no time prior to the actual promulgation of the standards made any statement, either directly or indirectly, to any one individual or group of individuals, giving any advance information as to the requirements of the amended standards. It would seem, therefore, that anyone who wittingly or unwittingly led the farmers to expect any particular standards assumed a responsibility which doubtless will result in some misunderstandings."

Let us see if anyone has been guilty of giving advance information or leading farmers to expect any particular standards. The Federal grades first became operative on August 1, 1917. In S. and R. A. No. 32, being the promulgation of the proposed changes in these standards, the Secretary of Agriculture states that in November and December, 1917, public hearings were held to determine whether those standards satisfactorily met existing marketing conditions. He then says:

"Advice and suggestions received through letters, in personal conferences, and at the hearings, developed the fact that the standards for wheat, which were formulated for the requirements of trade under normal competitive conditions, should be revised to meet present market requirements.

"After full consideration of all the suggestions presented, a draft of proposed standards has been prepared on the basis of the suggestions, which had in view for the most part present marketing conditions."

This "draft of proposed standards" is S. and R. A. No. 32, and it follows and forms a part of the foregoing announcement of the Secretary of Agriculture. It would seem that "a draft of proposed standards" is at least in the nature of "advance information," and would have a tendency to lead the farmers to expect the standards therein proposed. It would not appear difficult to determine who has been guilty of giving this advance information and leading farmers to expect particular standards, and who has thereby assumed the responsibility for some misunderstandings. Whether this was done "wittingly or unwittingly," the effect is the same.

I would like to point out a few other wide discrepancies between S. and R. A. No. 32, promulgating the proposed grades, and your letter, which you claim is applicable thereto. In the former it is stated, over the signature of the Secretary of Agriculture:

"Under present abnormal conditions mixtures of different classes of wheat, admixtures of rye and other factors which influence color, texture, and loaf volume of bread, do not play nearly so important a part in the marketing of wheat as they did under prewar conditions."

This statement, in connection with what has already been quoted from the same document, shows that the standards were to be revised to meet abnormal conditions, which conditions not only include those stated but also include the fixing of absolute prices by the Federal Administration. These abnormal conditions all still obtain; normal marketing conditions have not yet returned, nor is there any prospect that they will for some time to come. One of these abnormal conditions is the allowance of a considerable admixture of rye and other substitutes in flour used for bread. But in your letter to the North Dakota commissioner, you say:

"You will agree that permitting as much as 1 per cent of rye in No. 1, 2 per cent in No. 2, 3 per cent in No. 3, 5 per cent in No. 4, and 7 per cent in No. 5 is a very generous allowance and may prove, under normal marketing conditions, to be unsatisfactory to the great majority of our farmers who have no rye, or practically no rye, in their wheat."

It seems to us but natural that the farmer would conclude from Service and Regulatory Announcements No. 32 that he was about to be given stardards to meet abnormal marketing conditions, but your letter appears to advise him that the standards actually adopted have been prepared to meet normal marketing conditions.

You also state, "The presence of rye, even in small percentages, influences adversely the milling value of the wheat." Permit me to call your attention to Bulletin No. 328, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture on December 30, 1915, in which, on page 12, this statement is made:

"The presence of rye in wheat has a detrimental effect on the loaf value, and when more than 3 per cent of this ingredient is added the color and texture of the bread will be indisputably injured."

We have been furnished by the board of grain appeals of this State a report of baking tests which corroborates the foregoing statement made by your department. These tests show that the finest and highest grade of Pillsbury's best flour produced a loaf which graded 100 in color and 100 in quality. Flour made from No. 1 dark northern spring wheat with 3 per cent of rye added produced a loaf which graded exactly the same—100 in color and 100 in quality. Again, flour made from No. 1 dark northern spring with an admixture of 1½ per cent of rye and 1½ per cent of barley produced a loaf which graded 98½ in color and 100 in quality. Flour made from No. 1 dark northern spring wheat with 3 per cent of barley added produced a loaf which graded 99½ in color and 100 in quality. You state that allowing 1 per cent of rye in No. 1, 2 per cent in No. 2, and 3 per cent in No. 3 is a very generous allowance.

It is certainly generous to the millers. It permits them to make the same grade of flour from No. 3 as from No. 1 and get it for 6 cents a bushel less.

You further state that the average amount of rye admixture in all samples of all grades of hard red spring wheat examined by the department in the six years from 1911 to 1916, inclusive, was only one-tenth of 1 per cent. We can not believe that you wish to be understood as meaning that where wheat contained rye admixture it averaged only one-tenth of 1 per cent. We assume you took as a basis all of the wheat examined in the six years, both that containing rye and that containing no rye, and then took the total amount of rye found and dividing it by the total amount of wheat obtained this percentage. This method of figuring is misleading. Many cars might contain no rye, others a slight percentage, and others a considerable quantity. What we are dealing with is the fact that wheat is graded down to No. 2 when it contains 1.1 per cent of rye, and down to No. 3 when it contains 2.1 per cent of rye, when the millers can make exactly as good a grade of flour and receive exactly the same price from wheat containing as high as 3 per cent of rye as when it contains none. As between the producer and the miller, who is getting the "square deal?"

The further misleading character of your figures is shown by bulletin No. 328, before referred to, in which the statement is made on page 2 that an analysis of samples of wheat from the crops of 1911, 1912, and 1913 shows that rye was found in 83.1 per cent of the hard winter wheat samples secured and in 39.2 per cent of the spring and Durum wheat samples secured. You further state that if a relatively large amount of rye were permitted in the higher grades of wheat a strong inducement is offered to mix rye in all wheat whenever rye is cheaper than wheat, as is usually the case. The farmer has in some manner been led to believe that unusual conditions are now prevailing and that the standards ought to be governed accordingly. Since the advent of the war rye has been higher than wheat, sometimes a dollar a bushel higher; but the farmer finds that when he has it in his wheat, although in such small quantity that it does not affect its milling value, it reduces most substantially his grade and price. You say by permitting the mixing of rye the farmer who grows and markets wheat with little or no rye in it will be obliged to sell it on the same basis as wheat mixed with rye, and that this would mean a discount to the "many" farmers who produce pure wheat in order to benefit the relatively "few" farmers who produce wheat with rye mixture. The bulletin of your own department, above referred to, showing that 83 per cent of the hard winter wheat samples and 39 per cent of other wheat samples contained rye would not seem to indicate that very many farmers produced pure wheat and that there are few farmers who produce wheat with rye mixture; in fact, this same bulletin shows that there are no farmers who produce absolutely pure wheat.

In view of what has been said, we can scarcely understand your statement that the present Federal grades reflect fairly and sympathetically the milling values of the various qualities of hard red spring wheat. In an open competitive market the price is what reflects the milling value, but under fixed prices there is nothing but the grades which can reflect these values. The grain corporation, in fixing the prices, appear to have assumed that the grades would fairly reflect the milling value. What we said heretofore and shall say hereafter will simply demonstrate that the grades do not do this.

You state that No. 1 northern under the old Minnesota standards and No. 2 northern of the Federal standards are practically identical. Following this to its logical conclusion, we may conclude that No. 2 of all subclasses under the Federal grades would grade No. 1 under the old Minnesota grades. You then state that out of 75,563 cars of hard red spring wheat inspected August 1, 1917, to March 1, 1918, 35,225, or 46.62 per cent, graded No. 1 and 21,995, or 28.11 per cent, graded No. 2. It would seem to follow that, had the old Minnesota grades been in force, 57,220 cars, or 75.73 per cent, would have graded No. 1. There was then a loss of 3 cents a bushel to the producer on 21,995 cars, or 29.11 per cent, under the Federal grades. Further analyzing your statement, it would seem to follow that No. 3 Federal standards would grade No. 2 under the old Minnesota grades and that No. 4 would grade No. 3, etc. From the records of the Minnesota Inspection Department it appears that one-third of the 1917 crop graded No. 1, leaving two-thirds to grade No. 2 or less. The producers then, according to your own figures, would have received for this two-thirds of their crop 3 cents per bushel more than under the old Minnesota grades. In the northwestern spring-wheat belt the 1917 crop was 183,952,000 bushels, of which two-thirds is 122,635,666 bushels, which at 3 cents a bushel amounts to a total loss of $3,679,039.98. It is estimated that the 1918 crop will approximate that of 1915, which was 322,977,000 bushels, of which two-thirds is 215,318,000, which at 3 cents per bushel amounts to a loss of $6,759,540, the estimated loss on the 1918 crop. Small wonder the producers prefer to go back to the old Minnesota grades.

Your argument that the old Minnesota "No. 1 hard" grade was so stringent that but a small percentage of the crops of 1911 to 1916, inclusive, got into it, is not consistent with your statement that 31.65 per cent of the 1917 crop would have gone into that grade. It seems to us the fact that only a smaller percentage of the crop from 1911 to 1916 graded No. 1 is attributable to the quality of the crop rather than the grade standard. Again, you state, and use as a basis for argument, that No. 2 northern is the present commercial contract grade. This is not correct and the argument based on it should fall with it. The contract grade is No. 2 red spring wheat. This contract grade is fixed by the chamber of commerce and how it can be said that it furnishes a basis for figuring that the producers received a premium on their wheat under fixed prices is beyond our comprehension. Using your own language, did you make that statement wittingly or unwittingly? You figured that inspection of carload lots of hard red spring wheat entitled to premium 1917–18 shows a premium above contract received by the producer of from 1 cent to 7 cents, and you figure it on a basis of the price of $2.14 on No. 2 northern spring. We can just as consistently take the actual contract grade No. 2 red spring at the price of $2.12 and figure a premium of from 1 cent to 9 cents. Neither method of figuring puts one penny more into the pocket of the producers.

As to the Federal standards enabling the seller to receive a premium, the grain trade, as we have stated, adopts No. 2 red spring as the contract grade. The seller can deliver anything above No. 3, at contract price, but he can not collect any premium over the contract price. In fulfillment of his contract, he can deliver No. 3, dark northern, No. 3 northern, or No. 3 red spring, but in either case he must allow a discount of 5 cents a bushel. The No. 3 dark northern is at present higher than the No. 2 red spring, yet the seller must allow a discount of 5 cents per bushel.

Again, as we have before shown, No. 3 of any of these grades, may have been graded down on account of admixture of 2.1 per cent rye, and would make exactly as good a grade of flour. Nevertheless, the seller must give a discount of 5 cents per bushel. The premium under the Federal grades appears to be going in the wrong direction.

You appear to argue that the Federal grades are to be credited with abolishing spread in price. You proceed to show, however, that the result has been accomplished—as, of course, it must have been—by the fixing of a flat price by the administration on December 3, 1917. You state that under the old Minnesota grades, a spread in price of as much as 17 cents occurred in a single day, in No. 1 northern wheat. We find that under the Federal grades, in a single day—August 20, 1917—there was a spread of 40 cents on No. 1 northern, 40 cents on No. 2 northern, and 30 cents on No. 3 northern. The records show a much greater range in prices from the time of the adoption of the Federal grades to the time of the absolute fixing of prices than has ever been known in any corresponding period.

You state that farmers and representatives of the grain-growing interests were given every opportunity to present their claims at the various hearings, and that their suggestions have received careful consideration. Resolutions adopted by the representatives of the great grain-growing States, to wit, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, and Idaho, were presented at the Minneapolis hearing. It was earnestly urged that 15 per cent of moisture should be allowed in all grades. It would seem to one not an expert that, if 15 per cent of moisture will spoil No. 1 or No. 2 wheat, it will also spoil No. 3. It would seem that the moisture content, if not sufficient to cause actual deterioration, should be the same in all grades. In the official grades promulgated, there was allowed in the hard red spring and durum classes 14 per cent in No. 1, 14½ per cent in No. 2, 15 per cent in No. 3, and in all other classes 13½ per cent in No. 1, 14 per cent in No. 2, and 14½ per cent in No. 3.

It was also urged that the percentage of other wheat in grades 1, 2, and 3 should be 10 per cent. In No. 1 dark northern, if the wheat contains 10 per cent of other hard wheats, its milling and bread-producing qualities are certainly not affected. In the grades promulgated, only 5 per cent of other wheat is allowed in No. 1, and 10 per cent in all other grades, and No. 1 only admits 2 per cent of durum and 5 per cent in No. 2. Durum is an important factor in this market; why do you ignore it?

It was urged that 3 per cent of rye or barley, either singly or in combination, was clearly shown not to affect the milling and bread-producing qualities of the wheat, and that such amount should be allowed in No. 1. In the official grades, only 1 per cent is allowed in No. 1, 2 per cent in No. 2, and 3 per cent in No. 3.

It was also urged that there is found in wheat large quantities of valuable dockage, such as barley, oats, and flax, for which dockage the producer receives nothing; and it was urged that the following clause be added to the promulgation of official grades (which, by the way, is the same as is provided by the Minnesota statutes): "All dockage having value must be noted and the amount thereof specified on the inspector's certificate, the price-fixing board to determine the compensation to be paid for dockage having value." This request, which would give the producer something for what he now gives outright to the miller, was ignored.

These are but a few of the many amendments suggested by the grain-growing interests; and we can not find by careful comparison of the resolutions presented and the grades promulgated that you have adopted a single suggestion, either in whole or in part.

You state that the tentative grades as published in "Service and Regulatory Announcements No. 32" did not represent the final views of the department at that time, but were announced for the purpose of securing constructive criticism and advice. The letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, appended to the document, states that the tentative revision was made after 18 public hearings were held and after full consideration of all the suggestions presented. In other words, the grain-growing interests were led to believe that the tentative standards as promulgated were themselves the result of constructive criticism and advice. It would appear that the North Dakota commissioner is justified in asking from what source came the constructive criticism and advice which led to the almost complete revocation of the proposed standards and the substantial return to the old ones, which a member of your own department has stated were satisfactory to no one but the millers.

C. H. MARCH, Litchfield, Minn.,
THOS. E. CASHMAN, Owatonna, Minn.,
Members of Minnesota Public Safety Commission.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I got this brief time to-day during the consideration of this Agricultural bill to call to the attention of the House some of the anomalies, inconsistencies, and discriminations in the operation and practice of the various departments of the Government. We were told that the Overman consolidation act would bring about cooperation and harmony, articulation and consolidation, and all those other conditions necessary to a proper coordination of the various departments which we were so anxious to accomplish.

We are told—it is a trite saying, and the billboards have been placarded all over the country with the phrase—that "food will win the war." That is one of the reasons why there is an appropriation in the Agricultural bill—H. R. 9054—now under consideration, of $27,875,353 to stimulate food production; and in the bill which will be considered next Monday, H. R. 11945, there is an appropriation of over $11,000,000 for the purpose of stimulating food production.

This money is all to be expended out of the Treasury of the United States for the announced and avowed purpose of increasing food production.

In view of the desire to increase food production the people in my district, in Malheur County, Oreg., supposed that they would be permitted and encouraged to increase food production by expending their own money out of their own pockets. We have in that county what is known as the Warm Springs irrigation district, a municipal corporation or quasi one, a political subdivision of the State. On this Warm Springs project there have been irrigated for a number of years about 12,000 acres of land. They have water only sufficient for partial irrigation, not for full irrigation. By the expenditure of $750,000 they will fully irrigate and increase the production on the 12,000 acres next year 50 per cent, and in addition will irrigate in 1919 10,000 additional acres; that is equivalent to 16,000 new acres for 1919. In the year 1920 another 10,000 additional acres could be irrigated. I will tell you something about the fertility of the land.

Where they have been irrigating, they have raised 120 bushels of corn to the acre. They can raise on this project from 30 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre. If they could get the water for next year, they would raise approximately 500,000 additional bushels of wheat or other food equivalents. They desired to sell bonds to put this land completely under irrigation. They first went out among the neighbors, the merchants and farmers in the county, and there were some $400,000 worth of bonds subscribed. Then the matter was called to the attention of a bonding company in San Francisco. That company said it would take all of the bonds—$750,000 worth—so the district applied to the Capital Issues Committee for an approval of this proposed bond sale. This matter has been taken up by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, by Senator MCNARY, and myself, and by other members of our delegation, also by the Idaho delegation. We have had it before the Capital Issues Committee for about two months. Last Wednesday our application was disapproved. When I first took the matter up, several weeks ago, I was told by the secretary or the assistant secretary of the committee that everything looked favorable; that they were waiting for a report from the West from their agricultural agent; that they had received telegraphic information that that report was favorable. The next week I was told that Secretary McAdoo had issued an order or request for the curtailment of all municipal expenditures; that no irrigation-district applications for bond issues would be approved unless there were very exceptional circumstances and conditions surrounding the project. We thought this was an exceptional project, because it was not a new project. It was not a prospective project, but it was a going project. We would increase the production by 50 per cent on 12,000 acres, put in 10,000 acres more next year and 10,000 acres the following year. I was informed last Wednesday that our application had been rejected. I was first told prior to that that it might interfere with the liberty-loan drive. Our people do not want to do a thing to interfere with war activities or the liberty-loan drive. So our people promised, and the bonding company agreed, not to resell those bonds until the liberty-loan drive was in the clear, but notwithstanding that the application was rejected.

I was told last Wednesday that one of the reasons was that the War Industries Board had made a special request that this application should be rejected so that raw material might be conserved. There will be very little raw material used. All we need to do this fall is to build a dam. We have the necessary material there on the ground; we will need a little cement and we can get that from Utah, and I so informed the Capital Issues Committee. There will be absolutely no interference with any of the war activities or with the next liberty-loan drive, and it seems to me if we had the proper cooperation, the proper harmony between the various departments, that a project like this would be approved. It has been approved by the Reclamation Service. The Director of the Reclamation Service sent in the strongest kind of indorsement to the Capital Issues Committee. Secretary Lane has twice requested that there be an appropriation by the Congress in order to take up the work upon this particular project. We do not want to interfere with the war-time activities or the next liberty loan, yet it seems to me it is a strange anomaly when in the bill under consideration $27,000,000 are appropriated out of the public Treasury and $11,000,000 in the bill to be considered next Monday, all to increase food production, to deny the people in my district, the Warm Spring Irrigation District, the right, the privilege of going into their own pockets and spending their own money in a way that will increase next year wheat production by 500,000 bushels, or other food equivalents.

It seems to me that the various departments lack that harmony, that coordination and cooperation, or articulation, whatever you may wish to call it, that we should have in order to increase our food production, when such a project as the Warm Springs District is disapproved. You would think that the Government would gladly avail itself of this opportunity to increase food production, especially as it will not cost the Treasury one cent, whereas the two bills before the House call for nearly $40,000,000 out of the Treasury.

That is not the only anomaly and discrimination to which I wish to direct your attention. The approval of a seven hundred and fifty thousand dollar bond issue, not costing the Government one cent, is refused to the people of my district and State. This has been a dream of theirs for years, that they shall have increased irrigation in this section, that they shall enlarge an oasis in a semidesert and raise alfalfa, hogs, wheat, and other food products, and they are willing to pay for that out of their own pockets, not asking one cent out of the Treasury of the United States. That, however, is refused. On the other hand, listen to this: Here I have a copy of the Washington Post of September 8, with these headlines:

McAdoo may lend the B. & M. $20,000,000.—Plans to end New England transportation difficulties.

I wonder how much raw material that will take. Surely more than our little irrigation district.

It is proposed to take $20,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, and Secretary McAdoo is willing to advance that to the Boston & Maine Railroad. Yet in my district we are denied the privilege of spending our own money to increase the food production. The article says:

Mr. McAdoo also said he thought he could safely promise that New England would not see a renewal of the transportation difficulties of the past winter. A plan for the rehabilitation of the Boston & Maine Railroad with the aid of a loan of $20,000,000 from the Railroad Administration was announced by William G. McAdoo.

How much raw material will that $20,000,000 rehabilitation take?

I shall insert the article from the Washington Post in the RECORD. Here it is:

M'ADOO MAY LEND B. & M. TWENTY MILLION—PLANS TO END NEW ENGLAND TRANSPORTATION DIFFICULTIES.

BOSTON, September 7.

A plan for the rehabilitation of the Boston & Maine Railroad, with the aid of a loan of $20,000,000 from the Railroad Administration, was announced by William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, while on a tour of inspection of New England roads to-day. Mr. McAdoo also said he thought he could safely promise that New England would not see a renewal of the transportation difficulties of the past winter.

Interest on the money advanced to Boston & Maine, the Director General said, would be secured by mortgage bonds and trust funds, and approval of substantially all of the stockholders would be necessary before the plan could be put into effect.

"As now presented," Mr. McAdoo said, "the plan contemplates consolidation into one system of the Boston & Maine and its chief and proprietary lines, the holders of approximately $30,000,000 guaranteed stock of leased lines, receiving in exchange preferred stock of Boston & Maine bearing during five years four-fifths of the old rate of dividends and thereafter the present rate of dividends.

"This arrangement will reduce the fixed charges upon the system approximately $2,500,000 per annum, and lay a needed basis for a mortgage securing, on equal terms, all outstanding bonds and notes and provide a margin for any needed future issues.

"It is chiefly upon the security of bonds secured by such mortgage that the Government is now asked to advance approximately $20,000,000 necessary to carry out the plan of reorganization.

"Without such reorganization the Boston & Maine and its subsidiaries will continue to be seriously handicapped in raising funds for improvement on the properties absolutely required in the public interest.

"The Director General has decided to advance the necessary cash of about $20,000,000 upon a reasonable interest basis, secured by the mortgage bonds and trust funds, the general details to the plan to be, however, in all respects satisfactory to the Director General.

"The Director General will not support the plan unless it is approved by substantially all of the stockholders affected thereby."

Furthermore, I wish to state this, that in my opinion the Capital Issues Committee has no jurisdiction over this matter.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? That promise to the Boston & Maine Railroad was made two days before the Maine election.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; the Maine election was September 9. I asked one of the directors of the Capital Issues Committee, "What is your authority to pass on this bond issue?" He said it is the spirit of the act. I asked him to point out the specific language in this act that gives him any jurisdiction over a political subdivision of a State, over a municipal corporation, and he admitted to me that there was no specific authority in the act, but said it was the spirit of the act. I told him that the people of my district, if necessary, would forego their ambition, and whether the matter was covered by the language of the act or not, we were willing to stop our activities; we were willing to forego our ambition to build up our country at least while the war was on if that in any way embarrassed, hampered, or militated against war activities. But I could not and can not see how the sale of $750,000 worth of bonds could in any way embarrass the Government. It is an insignificant sum in comparison to the $40,000,000 appropriated in these two bills—insignificant in comparison to the proposed loan of $20,000,000 to the Boston & Maine Railroad, and besides it does not come from the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask the gentleman to yield me two minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SINNOTT. Here is the language of the act:

> The committee may * * * pass upon and determine whether it is compatible with the national interests that there should be sold * * * securities hereafter issued by any person, firm, corporation, or association * * *.

It takes no lawyer to know that the term "corporation," as used in the act, does not embrace a municipal corporation such as an irrigation district. Last Wednesday I asked one of the directors of the Capital Issues Committee to give me the reasons in writing why this project was turned down. He said, very courteously, that the act only requires them to find that it is not compatible with the national interests.

I told him I felt that the people in my district were entitled to know the reason why this great project was turned down and rejected. He promised to write me. That was last Wednesday. I have not received a word from that day to this as to the reason why this project has been turned down except what he orally told me. Gentlemen, when we are asked to create these committees and commissions we should be more circumspect in the future than we have been in the past. We have actually been creating Frankinsteins in our governmental activities and departments to arise to plague us.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. CRISP. I just want to state to my colleague that I was on the Ways and Means Committee that framed the law creating the Capital Issues Committee, and my recollection of what transpired was that the question came up as to whether this Capital Issues Committee would have control of securities or bonds to be issued by States or subdivisions, and it was agreed, and Secretary McAdoo stated, they would not have.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am glad to have my opinion confirmed by the gentleman from Georgia, Judge CRISP, a member of the committee, and a noted jurist before his election to Congress, and I shall add that other members of the Ways and Means Committee expressed to me the same view. The whole text of the act shows that they have no jurisdiction over municipal or bond issues by political subdivisions of a State, but notwithstanding that if it is necessary to conduct the war that we should abandon this project we are willing to do it, but we certainly are entitled to have the reasons in writing why a project like this is turned down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

EIGHT BILLION DOLLAR REVENUE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, last May a year ago I addressed the House at some length on the revenue bill that was then before it. You will remember that at that time the administration's estimate of the first year's cost of the war was $3,800,000,000. The Ways and Means Committee reported out a bill to raise $1,800,000,000 by taxation—a sort of 50-50 proposition; that is, to raise half by taxation and half by the sale of bonds.

There were a few gentlemen in this House, myself among them, who thought a much larger sum should and could be raised by taxation. My reasons for that position were stated in my speech of May 14, 1917. We did not get very far then, except we did succeed in materially raising the taxes on incomes. In that speech I said in part:

> The chief sources for additional taxes at this time should be from the following:
> 1. A tax that will take substantially all of the special war profits.
> 2. Increase the rate of income tax, with a sharp progression in rates as incomes become larger to 100 per cent of all incomes after a certain fixed amount.
> 3. High consumption taxes on all luxuries.

In his special message to Congress, President Wilson, on May 27, 1918, recommended the same sources for additional taxes in the following statement:

> We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries.

The President's statement is more condensed than mine, but he is driving at the same thing that I did over a year before.

After the revenue bill left the House last May a year ago conditions grew worse in Europe, owing to the disintegration of Russia. It became evident that we would have to take a larger part in the war than was first anticipated. So, by August, 1917, the administration raised its estimate of the first year's cost of the war from $3,800,000,000 to nearly $12,000,000,000, exclusive of our loans to the allies. The estimate for this year's cost of the war is $24,000,000,000. Last year some gentlemen argued that business could not stand to raise more than $1,800,000,000 by taxation. This year these same gentlemen make the same assertions about this bill to raise $8,000,000,000.

I realize as fully as anyone that the taxing power should not be carried to the extent of killing off industries and business. To successfully prosecute war, industries must be maintained at the highest point of efficiency and productivity. Then, too, after-the-war conditions must be taken into consideration, so when peace comes we can compete with other nations in the markets of the world. Unreasonable profits are being made by many as the result of the war. This fact has been repeatedly called to the attention of Congress. Profiteering runs "impudently rampant" in many industries. The Trade Commission in its report to the Senate of June 27, 1918, pointed out many flagrant cases of profiteering. Concerning the packers, this report says:

> However delicate a definition is framed for "profiteering," these packers have preyed upon the people unconscionably.

We say all kinds of mean things about the "profiteer," but what does he care, so long as he is left undisturbed in the enjoyment of his unholy profits? I believe this bill will get some of them, and I congratulate the committee on reporting out a bill as good as this one. It is a great improvement over the one passed by Congress a year ago. We must raise just as much of the war's cost as we possibly can by taxation. To raise all the cost of the war by taxation is now impossible. The balance will be raised by the sale of bonds to the people.

The less we finance the war by bonds and the more by taxation the sooner will we be relieved from its financial burdens after the war. The only time to get war profits is during the war. When the war is over that source of revenue will be gone. We should take all the war profits over a fair return on the investment in that kind of business.

I supported this bill as I have supported every measure for the successful and vigorous prosecution of the war. Recently Congress placed at the disposal of the administration all the manhood of the country from 18 to 45. Now, there should be no hesitancy to back those men with every dollar in the country. The men at the front who are risking their lives should not be required to pay off a tremendous debt when they come back, when that debt can be greatly reduced by placing heavy taxes on war profits, incomes, and luxuries.

Although this bill is four times larger than the last one, I have not received a single protest against it. The people are united in the common purpose to win the war. They want the taxes just as high as possible without the destruction of industry and business. They want every man and every dollar dedicated to the accomplishment of a decisive victory over Germany. [Applause.]

WAR LEGISLATION.

Mr. Chairman, my service as a Member of this body began March 4, 1915. The European war had then been raging for six months. Our Nation by formal declaration became a belligerent April 6, 1917. Since that time I have not cast a single partisan vote in this body, nor have I made a single partisan utterance in or out of Congress.

The winning of the war is the supreme and paramount issue. Win the war we must and we will. The Nation's attitude is the same as was the attitude of the North during the Civil War. Here let me quote words of the immortal Lincoln, June 16, 1864:

> We accepted this war for an object, for a worthy object, and the war will end when that object is attained. Under God I hope it will never end until that time. * * * This war has taken three years. * * * I say we are going through on this line if it takes three years more

That is the spirit of America to-day—to fight, at whatever cost and sacrifice, until the worthy object for which we entered the war is attained. We will stand back of our gallant and brave boys at the front until German militarism is wiped off the face of the earth. The heart of the Nation has but one purpose, to unite and make triumphant free peoples and free institutions over autocracy and militarism. There will be no end to this war until that is accomplished.

Before our entrance into the war I voted for all preparedness measures recommended by the War and Navy Departments. Every law written on the statute books for the increase of the Army and Navy and every dollar appropriated therefor had my support. W. Ray Loomis, assistant superintendent of the document room, House of Representatives, has compiled the public laws and resolutions for the increase of the Army and Navy of the Sixty-fourth Congress with bearing on the trans-Atlantic war, which I shall append to my remarks. I voted for every one of them.

Since the war Congress convened, on April 2, 1917, to September 1, 1918, there have been enacted by Congress, with the approval of the President, 39 public resolutions and 210 public laws. Of these, 17 public resolutions and 113 public laws are classed as war measures. I shall append to my remarks a list of the 17 public resolutions, for all of which I voted. I shall also append a list of the 113 public laws bearing on or as a result of the war, all of which had my support and vote except one railroad bill.

This has been an arduous session. Besides the legislation which requires careful study and consideration there is an unusual amount of work which falls to the lot of a Congressman. On account of the war a thousand people have come into vital contact with the Federal Government where there was one before. New questions have arisen, and the people naturally turn to their Congressman at Washington, whom they know. Scores of complicated questions are pending and new ones continually arising. Questions concerning railroads, car shortage, operation of mines, labor shortage on farms, Food Administration rules, Fuel Administration regulations, and so forth, are referred to the Congressman. Almost daily there are requests for aid in getting allotments and allowances for the dependents of soldiers and sailors. This service is most gladly rendered, as it is for the relief of the loved ones of the men who are at the front fighting our battles "over there."

Day by day come letters and telegrams for information concerning the dead, wounded, and missing. Before me are two, typical of many:

> ——— ———, of Company ———, Regiment ———, American Expeditionary Forces, is by rumor reported either killed or died in a hospital. Can you find out from the department and wire me at once?

Some of these rumors upon investigation are unfounded, and a word from the War Department to that effect relieves the anguish and distress of a parent or a wife and their friends. Another:

> We know you are very busy but we need a little help. We don't know who to ask so we ask you, as you are our representative. Our son ——— ———, Company ——— ——— Infantry, crossed overseas in April and we haven't heard from him since, and we thought maybe you could help us locate him. Please help us if you can.

This is a part of the individual work which a Congressman does most cheerfully for the people of his own district, which requires time and vital energy to do, as well as to learn to do well. In these times when the choicest blood of the Nation is being spilled, we must remember that the burdens we bear and the sacrifices we make are as nothing compared to what our boys in Europe are doing and sacrificing for our common country. All must work, sacrifice, and suffer.

The President and Congress have worked together during this emergency with a spirit of cooperation and unanimity never before known in the history of the world. The President has publicly attested to this upon more than one occasion, the last time being May 27, 1918: "I have admired the work of this session. The way in which the two Houses of Congress have cooperated with the Executive has been generous and admirable." This spirit should prevail until victory is ours.

The work of the Navy in this war has been remarkable. The achievements of the Navy have silenced all critics. The transportation of nearly 2,000,000 soldiers over a sea infested with deadly submarines, with the loss of so few soldiers, is next to the miraculous. The building up of a large Army, too, although slow at first, is in keeping with American traditions and American initiative and genius. Mistakes have been made, it is true; but failures, outside of the production of aeroplanes, have been few.

What American heart has not been thrilled by what has occurred on the west front the past 70 days. It was the initiative and courage of American soldiers that turned the tide at Chateau Thierry and Belleau Woods, and that gave us the victory at St. Mihiel. Long will their heroic deeds be remembered by all lovers of freedom. The tide has turned and forward and onward will be the march of the allied armies until there will be possible for all the peoples of this earth governments "of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to also ask that I may not be interrupted in the limited time which has been given me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to devote the time which is given me this afternoon to discussing the unfair distribution of war encampments and war activities between the States of the North and the South, and to make some comments upon the preparation that Pennsylvania has made and the work this great Commonwealth is carrying on in aiding the Federal Government in the prosecution of this great war.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to invite the attention of the Members of the House to what I consider as unfair discrimination against the great State of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor in part to represent in this Congress, in the matter of the distribution of war encampments and war industrial plants and the resulting expenditures of money in the States wherein these war activities are located. I make no invidious comparisons when I say of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and her citizens that there may be other States that are as loyal and other people that are as thoroughly backing the administration in this war, but there are none that are doing more toward winning this war.

MEN FURNISHED IN THE ARMY.

When the first registration was made in Pennsylvania under the selective-draft law, June 5, 1917, 860,000 men registered, and when the law was amended, permitting those who have attained the age of 21 to register on the 5th of June, 1918, 60,759 additional young men registered, bringing the total registration up to 920,759. Of these 215,000 were placed in class 1. Under the man-power bill there were registered on the 12th of September, 1918, 1,100,000 additional men, which brings the total registration in Pennsylvania of men available for military service up to the stupendous number of 2,020,759. From this number Pennsylvania has actually sent into the military service in this war up to September 12, 1918, as follows:

Keystone Division (Twenty-eighth Division)	27,500
Machine-gun battalion (Rainbow Division)	750
Regular Army	80,000
Navy and marines	15,000
Selective service of drafted men	183,748

and will between September 12 and October 18, 1918, send 14,497 additional, or furnish to the Nation a total of 321,495 men for our Army to battle for the freedom of the world.

The Tenth Pennsylvania, now the One hundred and tenth United States Infantry, along with the One hundred and ninth and One hundred and eleventh, all from Pennsylvania, fought in the battle of Chateau Thierry from the last week in June to the 9th of August and succeeded in driving the Germans back across the Vesle, a distance of 24 miles, losing more than one-fourth of their men killed, wounded, and missing. These troops have by their bravery and fighting ability won immortality, shed lustre on American arms, and turned the tide of victory in favor of the allies.

MONEY FURNISHED.

In the matter of furnishing funds Pennsylvania yields to no other State in friendly rivalry in this respect. The legislature appropriated $5,000,000 to be expended by a commission, of which the governor is the head, on war activities, and her citizens have oversubscribed their allotment of each of the three liberty loan bond issues already made. In the matter of raising funds for the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, Hebrew Association, and other war charities all of these funds have been oversubscribed when asked for by those concerned in raising these charitable gifts, and the plans are now well laid for the fourth liberty loan, which will be oversubscribed promptly, as has been done in each of the three previous bond issues. [Applause.]

REVENUES PAID TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

For the fiscal year 1918 Pennsylvania has paid into the United States Treasury under the war-revenue bills the stupendous sum of $495,889,801.05, being an increase of 11.8 per cent over the amount paid in 1917. This splendid sum is 17.5 per cent of the total revenue of the entire country for the year 1918. I may, therefore, be pardoned for expressing as a citizen of Pennsylvania my feeling of gratification at this splendid showing of the money contributed and men furnished to the Union in the prosecution of this world war.

While the citizens of Pennsylvania have furnished all these men and stand ready to furnish more, and have subscribed and donated these vast sums of money and are ready to subscribe and donate all that may be required in the future, out of a pure sense of patriotic duty to the Union in this time of need, and seek no reward other than the consciousness of duty performed, yet we have been differentiated against and slighted by those in charge of the preparation for war in the matter of the location of encampments for the training of troops and war industries to such an extent that it seems to me that attention should be directed to what really appears to be unjust and unfair discrimination against my native State.

Neither Pennsylvania nor her citizens have complained, but a sense of fair play and just treatment compels me to call attention to the fact that in the matter of the location of camps for the training of troops and the various activities for the preparations for war which are strictly under Government control Pennsylvania has been slighted, avoided, and not given just and fair recognition.

In these remarks no reference is made to naval activities, because such might give information to the enemy, and the locations of these are generally controlled by harbor facilities, labor conditions, and special circumstances, but the matter of war activities and the location of encampments has already been made public.

The War Department issues maps, giving the places where these are; railroad companies advertise them, and they are not in any way secret, and it is therefore no breach of confidence whatever to call the attention of the public and of this House to the injustice and sectional bias that have been exercised by those who have located these war activities.

LOCATION OF ENCAMPMENTS AND WAR ACTIVITIES BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The General Government has expended approximately $691,886,000 in establishing encampments for the training of troops and emergency war plants for the manufacture of war materials within the limits of the United States. Of this stupendous sum Pennsylvania has received a little over $8,893,732, which expenditure has been made at the following places and in the following sums:

Supply depot and warehouses, Middletown, $1,413,000.
Temporary aviation barracks, Essington, $5,732.
Hospital Corps, Allentown (not large; not obtainable).
Tank service, Gettysburg (small; not obtainable).

No reference is made to the proposed ordnance plant to be located near Pittsburgh, which is not constructed strictly for the present war, since it will not be finished for several years.

This very small expenditure of war funds in Pennsylvania is unfair and rank discrimination against my native State. The large State military camping ground at Mount Gretna, which the Regular Army have used on many occasions and which is now available for the use by the National Government without cost, is unoccupied. The vast areas of State-owned lands that could be used at small cost by the General Government for aviation fields, Artillery training camps, and general Infantry training purposes have not been used or occupied to any extent, except one gun range which has been established in a limited way and little used.

Certainly Pennsylvania has not been passed up, slighted, and ignored because she has failed to do her part; it must then be for partisan or sectional reasons.

This brief investigation, brought about by the discrimination against Pennsylvania in the matter of the location of war activities and industries, has led me to look beyond that State and take a general view of the whole country for the purpose of ascertaining how other States and sections of the country have fared when it came to locating encampments for the training of troops and war industries for the preparation of war, with the resultant distribution of funds expended in the communities where these are placed. It is very evident that Pennsylvania has probably fared worse than any other State, taking into account its size and importance, but it is also readily apparent that the North has received scant consideration in these matters and that the vast majority of these activities are located in 16 Southern States, and into these States the Federal Treasury has and is pouring a steady stream of gold, that is distributed among these encampments and war activities and ultimately reaching the pockets of the inhabitants of these States.

Dividing the States into two groups, I find that 16 Southern States have received from the General Government in the way of initial expenditures for the establishment of cantonments and strictly war activities the stupendous sum of $490,306,991.34. These States and the amount received by each are as follows:

Alabama	$61,386,145.36
Arkansas	15,409,572.56
Florida	7,278,201.24
Georgia	28,710,845.85
Kentucky	8,375,239.90
Louisiana	6,240,474.65
Maryland	39,187,441.87
Mississippi	5,544,514.92
New Mexico	4,007,545.86
North Carolina	4,518,761.39
Oklahoma	5,174,646.07
South Carolina	19,045,284.95
Tennessee	76,672,100.00
Texas	32,652,744.11
Virginia and West Virginia	176,103,472.61
Total	490,306,991.34

This is but a small part of the money that has been and is being expended by soldiers and the friends of soldiers in each State around these encampments, and of the amount for salaries and the wages, the monthly pay roll being about $1,500,000, that is being constantly poured into these favored Southern States by the Federal Treasury.

An analysis of the purpose for which these vast sums have been expended in these Southern States in the light of their political complexion is most interesting.

The State of Alabama, that has a solid Democratic delegation in Congress, has been taken care of by the Secretary of War by the location of four camps and two industrial plants, with an original expenditure of $61,386,145.36, and by a continued flow of gold into that State that is passing from the Federal Treasury to these places since the date of their establishment.

Arkansas, also with a solid Democratic delegation in both Houses of Congress, has received the establishment of three encampments and one picric-acid plant at a cost of $15,409,572.56, with the resultant benefits that arise therefrom.

Georgia, also with a solid Democratic delegation in Congress, is favored with seven military encampments and an acid plant, originally costing $7,000,000, or a total expenditure for these war activities of $28,710,845.85.

South Carolina, that also has a solid Democratic delegation in both Houses of Congress, has been favored with five encampments, upon which the Government originally expended $19,045,284.95.

Tennessee has been favored with an original expenditure in this respect of $76,672,100.

Texas, the State that rarely, if ever, sends a Republican to Congress, seems to have been especially favored, for here the Secretary of War has bestowed the Nation's benevolence with a lavish hand, and established 25 military camps in this State, upon which the Government expended originally $32,652,744.11. The flow of gold from the Treasury into Texas breaks out in 25 prolific springs in various parts of the State.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I can not yield; I have not the time.

Virginia and West Virginia come in for an expenditure of $176,103,472.61, no doubt accounted for by Virginia's political loyalty to the Democratic Party.

North Carolina, solidly Democratic, has one encampment already established, at Charlotte, upon which the Government originally expended $4,518,761.39. Another is being completed at Fayetteville. I presume it will be called Camp Simmons in honor of the senior Senator from that State, whose influence, it is claimed, secured its establishment.

In connection with this encampment we are able to give the reason why these military cantonments and war activities are located in the South, and this reason is political.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I will not yield.

Senator SIMMONS is a candidate for reelection in the State of North Carolina. He has advertised throughout the State that he is in favor of 35-cent cotton, the location of military cantonments in his native State, and the establishment of a Government munition belt.

To quote with reference to the Fayetteville encampment:

"SENATOR SIMMONS IS GIVEN LARGE SHARE OF CREDIT FOR THE CAMP—HIS TALK WITH MR. BAKER PROBABLY DECIDED THE MATTER—RESOLUTIONS FROM FAYETTEVILLE THANKING SENATOR PRESENTED."

"Secretary King, of the Fayetteville Chamber of Commerce, brought to Washington to-day resolutions adopted at a recent meeting of that organization, thanking Senator SIMMONS for the part he played in landing an Army camp at Fayetteville."

Thus it appears that political influence, working on Secretary of War Baker, has succeeded in having him establish a military camp at Fayetteville, in North Carolina, in July of this year, during a political contest for Senator in that State and more than a year after all the other great encampments had been located. It is fair to assume, therefore, that these same influences have brought about the establishment in the Southern States of the great preponderance of military encampments and the expenditure of these vast sums of money for war activities. This does not seem to indicate that "politics is adjourned" when the "loaves and fishes" are being distributed.

The average cantonment accommodates from 25,000 to 40,000 men at $30 per month, and the pay roll would be from $750,000 to $1,200,000. Adding the officers' salary would bring the amount up to one million or to one and one-half million per month that is distributed in each encampment. Even though all the encampments are not so large as this, it can be readily seen what streams of gold these encampments are distributing in the Southern States.

In sharp contrast with these expenditures in the Southern States is the expenditure for like activities in 14 Northern States, where most of the money in the North has been expended, because there are many Northern States where no encampments or activities exist at all, and which States usually send a solid Republican delegation to Congress.

Let us examine these briefly. I find in these 14 Northern States the Federal Government has expended for like war purposes only $200,559,222.01, which money has been disbursed as follows:

California	$14,980,398.84
Illinois	11,878,150.11
Indiana	582,000.00
Iowa	9,518,975.38
Kansas	11,611,998.31
Massachusetts	11,480,837.87
Michigan	18,165,178.56
Nebraska	549,266.00
New Jersey	51,103,884.79
New York	17,818,965.30
Ohio	36,116,364.04
Pennsylvania	8,893,732.00
Vermont	108,823.13
Washington	8,750,647.68
Total	200,559,222.01

Iowa has one encampment, upon which the Government has expended $9,518,975.36. Indiana has one encampment, upon which the Government has expended only $582,000. Kansas has one encampment, upon which there has been expended $11,611,998.31. This is at a permanent post known as Fort Riley. Massachusetts has one encampment, upon which has been expended $11,480,837.87. Michigan has two encampments and two acid plants, upon which has been expended $18,165,178.56. Nebraska has a balloon school and an aviation field, upon which there has been expended only $549,266. New Jersey has one encampment, one embarkation camp, and one radio laboratory, upon which has been expended $20,976,268.79; and one powder plant, upon which has been expended $7,000,000; and four loading and assembling plants at the seaports, upon which there has been expended $30,127,816.79. Ohio has one training camp, three flying fields at Dayton, and a nitrate plant at Cincinnati, on all of which has been expended $36,116,364.04. Pennsylvania has a supply depot at Middletown, on which there has been expended $1,400,000; temporary barracks for aviation at Essington, on which has been expended $5,700; and a tank-service camp at Gettysburg, and the Medical Corps at Allentown, which expenditures it was impossible to get, but which have been quite small, and a smokeless powder plant and nitrate plant upon which has been expended $8,893,732. The State of Vermont has one encampment, located at old Fort Ethan Allen, on which was expended $108,823.13. In New York are located the embarkation encampments for the whole country, which could only be established at this port, from which nearly all the soldiers sail en route to Europe, yet there has only been expended at or near this great port $17,593,965.30.

This analysis of the expenditures in the North shows conclusively that political influence has been brought to bear on the Secretary of War, and that he has not only made these expenditures for political reasons but for sectional purposes also; and if the present political influence is to continue to control the location of encampments no doubt some of these which are now located in the North will be abandoned and new ones established in their stead in the South, like the Fayetteville cantonment, and that the other war activities will be further concentrated in the South. Each time an administration Senator is up for reelection or a Democratic candidate for Congress is in danger of defeat we may expect to see a cantonment established in his district to help along the political fortunes of some administration Democrat.

Another matter should be noted in this connection. Not only are the Northern States furnishing men greatly in excess of those furnished by the South to fight this war, but the Northern States are paying in by far the greatest part of the income tax, which is the chief source of financial support of the Federal Government at this time. For convenience and information let us contrast the amount of revenue received from the same two groups of States among which we have shown that the Secretary of War has distributed, so inequitably and unjustly, the public money for war activities.

The Revenue Commissioner on September 14, 1918, issued his report showing the amount of taxes collected for the current fiscal year from the various States of the Union. The States enumerated in group 1 have paid into the Federal Treasury in round figures income tax as follows:

Group No. 1.

Alabama	$18,200,000
Arkansas	5,700,000
Florida	4,600,000
Georgia	16,200,000
Kentucky	20,900,000
Louisiana	21,800,000
Maryland	40,000,000
Mississippi	4,900,000
New Mexico	1,800,000
North Carolina	20,200,000
Oklahoma	18,200,000
South Carolina	7,800,000

Tennessee	$14,100,000
Texas	30,300,000
Virginia	21,400,000
West Virginia	45,500,000
Total	291,600,000

With this modest sum, contrast the stupendous amount of money collected from the States designed as group 2, which States paid into the Federal Treasury $2,190,000,000, as follows:

Group No. 2.

California	$76,600,000
Illinois	275,500,000
Indiana	29,000,000
Iowa	14,900,000
Kansas	25,900,000
Massachusetts	166,600,000
Michigan	71,000,000
Nebraska	11,000,000
New Jersey	71,000,000
New York	689,200,000
Ohio	241,000,000
Pennsylvania	495,800,000
Vermont	3,500,000
Washington	19,300,000
Total	2,190,300,000

It is therefore established by these authentic figures beyond the peradventure of a doubt that not only is the North furnishing the great preponderance of the money and men to fight this war, but that it has received scant consideration, indeed, from the Secretary of War in the acknowledgment of these invaluable services in the distribution of war activities.

This amply demonstrates the truth of the assertion made by one of the well-known Democrats from the South in Congress that "they expected to get the men and the money from the North to fight this war."

I append to these remarks two tables in explanation and proof of the statements above given: Table No. 1 shows the location of the cantonments and various war industrial plants referred to and the amount of money expended on each. Table No. 2 gives in detail the amount of income tax collected for the current fiscal year from the various States of the Union.

Nothwithstanding this unfair treatment of the North and the sections of the country from whence come Republican Representatives to Congress, the Republican Party will continue to support the administration as it has in the past in the prosecution of this war to a successful and victorious conclusion with unanimity and patriotic devotion. [Applause.] Nothing will deter it from this. Republican support of the administration at all times can be relied upon. I do not accuse any person or party of disloyalty. There are no disloyal Members of Congress, yet it is fair to state in justice to the record of the Republican Party in the Sixty-fifth Congress that the three vital laws demanded by the administration as essential to the prosecution of this war against the Imperial German Government and her allies were all enacted under Republican leadership and against the protest of the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that had charge of these laws and many members of that party. These bills are:

1. Selective-draft law.
2. Quota or classification bill.
3. Man-power act.

Without these three laws on the statute books the administration would be greatly impeded, if not practically prevented from organizing our Army and successfully prosecuting this war. In fact, our whole military organization, which is the wonder and admiration of the world, and which is striking terror to the very heart of Imperial Germany, rests on these three fundamental laws, and for their enactment the Republican Party claim and are entitled to full credit for leadership.

The Republican Party has thus waived all desire for political advantage during this war and "has placed country above party," and while it does feel a grievance at the unjust treatment it and the Northern States of the Union have received at the hands of the Secretary of War, at the instance of the majority party, yet nothing will deter or prevent the Republicans from their continued undivided and enthusiastic support of the administration in all legislation asked for in the prosecution of this war for liberty against Germany and her allies, and this support will continue until complete victory is won and a lasting peace attained. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, though I do not agree with the contention set forth in the President's veto message, I have no desire or disposition to criticize, or to take exception to any statement made, or to question the President's judgment or knowledge of facts, so what I shall have to say in no way reflects upon him. I appreciate that he is a busy man and that in determining questions he must necessarily depend upon others to furnish him with data and information, particularly so in this instance. My understanding is that his time and attention has been devoted to other lines of activity; that his experience in growing and marketing of wheat is limited, therefore I assume that statements made in the message were based upon data and information furnished to him by others, and that he has evidently been somewhat misinformed in the matter. Of course, most unfortunate.

First, I desire to call attention to the President's statement that the measure—the Agricultural bill—was returned because of an "earnest dissent, from the point of view of principle as well as of wise expediency, from the provision of that part of section 14 which prescribes a uniform minimum price for No. 2 northern spring wheat of $2.40 per bushel," because it is believed "that such inelastic legislative price provisions are insusceptible of being administered in a way that will be advantageous either to the producer or to the consumer." If his adviser had turned to the provision objected to in the bill, he would have found that it provides that the "guaranteed price for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 2 northern spring or its equivalent of not less than $2.40 per bushel at the principal primary markets designated by the President by proclamation issued by him February 21, 1918, and at such other places as the President may designate." Compare it with the act of August 10, 1917, approved by the President, which contained this provision: "The guaranty price for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets." It will be seen that the wording is word for word, except that the price in the act of August 10, 1917, was fixed at $2 instead of $2.40 and the price based on No. 1 northern spring instead of No. 2 northern spring, hence the principle is the same. That bill was approved and evidently believed to be sound in principle, wise, and expedient then. If so, I am unable to see why not now.

As to the prices fixed by the President's proclamation and those fixed in this bill, the President's own proclamation of February 21, 1918, contains this language: I do hereby determine and fix and give public notice of reasonable guaranteed prices for No. 1 northern spring wheat and its equivalents at the respective principal primary markets as follows, to wit:

Chicago, Ill., $2.20 per bushel, later increased to $2.26.

Omaha, Nebr., $2.15 per bushel, later increased to $2.18 per bushel.

Kansas City, $2.15 per bushel, later increased to $2.18 per bushel.

St. Louis, Mo., $2.18 per bushel, later increased to $2.24 per bushel.

Duluth, Minn., $2.17 per bushel, later increased to $2.22½ per bushel.

Minneapolis, Minn., $2.17 per bushel, later increased to $2.21½ per bushel.

New York, $2.28 per bushel, later increased to $2.39½ per bushel.

Philadelphia, $2.27, later $2.39.

Baltimore, $2.27, later $2.38¾.

Newport News, Va., $2.27, later $2.38¾.

Portland, Oreg., $2.05, later $2.20.

Seattle, Wash, $2.05, later $2.20.

San Francisco, Cal., $2.10, later $2.20.

Los Angeles, $2.10, later $2.20.

Galveston and New Orleans, $2.20, later $2.28.

At Salt Lake City, Utah; Great Falls, Mont.; Spokane, Wash.; and Pocatello, Idaho, the price was first fixed at $2 per bushel; at Fort Worth, Tex., at $2.09; at Oklahoma City, $2.05; Wichita, Kans., $2.08; at Charleston, S. C., and Savannah, Ga., at $2.27—28 in all.

I might add that the prices last fixed by the President have recently been guaranteed for the 1919 crop. The price in the Agricultural bill returned without approval fixed the price at $2.40 per bushel at the 28 markets named in the President's proclamation and at such others as the President may designate. Again, the principle involved is the same as is involved in the act signed by the President in 1917, the only difference being the price and grade upon which the price shall be based. The President's contention is that a fixed minimum price of $2.40 per bushel would, he estimated, add $2 per barrel to the price of flour; in other words, raise the price of flour from the present price of $10.50 at the mill to $12.50 at the mill, and inasmuch as we are anticipating a crop of approximately 900,000,000 bushels of wheat, this increase would be equivalent to the immense sum of $387,000,000 according to his message.

Again, if his advisers had referred the President to the Federal Trade Commission's report of April last on flour milling and flour jobbing he would have found that on an average approximately 4⅝ bushels of wheat are required to make a barrel of flour, and in some instances only 4½ bushels are required; that there are some 7,000 merchant wheat flour mills in the United States, which during the last three years have produced on the average 118,000,000 barrels of flour annually, grinding about 550,000,000 bushels of wheat per year; that from 11,000,000 to 16,000,000 barrels of flour have been exported annually.

If so, only 100,000,000 barrels of flour are consumed in the United States. Two dollars a barrel on 118,000,000 would be $236,000,000, $2 on 100,000,000 would be $200,000,000—not $387,000,000, as stated in the President's proclamation.

He would also have found that millers operating profits under Government regulation has increased nearly 175 per cent, and that their rate of profit on investments increased more than 100 per cent, which in a large degree accounts for the high cost of living. If 4⅝ bushels of wheat is all that is required to produce a barrel of flour, $2 per barrel would be equivalent to 43 cents per bushel. The proposed increase over the price fixed by the President ranges from the lowest at New York, one-half cent per bushel, to the highest at Omaha and Kansas City, at 22 cents, plus the difference in price of No. 1 and No. 2 spring northern, which is about 3 cents per bushel. Assuming that the President would have fixed a uniform price of $2.40 at all the principal interior markets, or, in other words, increasing the lowest price fixed from $2.18 to $2.40, and all along the line up to the highest from $2.39 to $2.40, plus 3 cents differential in grade, what would it have amounted to?

I have not the figures giving the number of bushels marketed at each of the various principal interior markets named in the proclamation, but if one averages up with the other, and if we cut the 22 cents, the highest difference, in half, the average increase would be 11 cents per bushel; add to that the 3 cents difference in grade value, we have an increase of 14 cents per bushel; but, in order to be absolutely on the safe side, we can call it 20 cents; if so, the increased cost of wheat to make a barrel of flour would be, not $2, but less than $1 per barrel. If we have, as anticipated, a 900,000,000-bushel crop, and if every bushel of wheat is marketed, the 20-cent increase will be equivalent, not to the immense sum of $387,000,000, as set forth in the message, but less than one-half of that amount, or $180,000,000; but anybody having any knowledge of wheat growing knows that all the wheat grown is not ground into flour and that all flour is not made out of wheat and that all flour is not sold. Everybody knows that wheat must be set aside for seed; substitutes have been ordered for wheat by the Food Administration; besides much of the wheat flour is consumed by the producers, which does not enter into the computation. As stated in the Federal Trade Commission's report, only about 550,000,000 bushels of wheat, or only about 118,000,000 barrels of flour, were ground; and 11,000,000 to 16,000,000 barrels of that were exported, and only part of that is made of wheat alone, and only a part of it sold for consumption. If the increased cost were less than $1 per barrel, the increased cost to the consumer would be much less than $100,000,000; it would be less than one-quarter of the $387,000,000 estimated increased cost. Or, if the President should have increased the price of wheat 22 cents per bushel, to make up the difference between the lowest price of $2.18 and the price fixed in the bill of $2.40, and a corresponding increase of 22 cents at all the markets, plus the 3-cent differential in grade, in all, a total increase of 25 cents on all wheat entering into production of flour, the increased cost of all the 550,000,000 bushels of wheat ground into flour would have been only $137,000,000, deducting the amount consumed by the producer which does not enter into the computation. The increased cost to the consumer would have been less than $100,000,000.

If attention is to be given to the increased cost and profits, in my opinion, our attention should be directed to other channels. Why single out the wheat grower? Why should his nose be kept to the grindstone and permit everybody else to reap exorbitant profits? Compare this increased cost of less than $100,000,000 with the $431,684,936 profits for 1917 over 1914 taken by the Steel Trust—an increased profit of over 1,000 per cent. One concern—the Nagle Steel Co.—made a profit on its investments of 319.67 per cent; in other words, its profits for the year were equivalent to its investments more than three times over. Four meat packers—Armour, Swift, Morris, and Cudahy—increased their profits $121,000,000 over their prewar profits. Add the excess profits of the Steel Trust to the excess profits taken by the four meat packers and we have the stupendous sum of $552,684,836. Add to that the many millions made by the tanneries and other subsidiary companies, the millions made in padding their costs by heavily increasing their salaries and other manipulations as, for instance, the commission calls attention to the salaries paid by the American Metal Co. (Ltd.), New York, a concern dealing in zinc, whose president received a salary of $364,326.73; others received upward of $200,000—add it all up and then compare it with the profits and returns to the 6,000,000 farmers and their families, who received not 319 per cent on their investment or a thousand per cent profit over prewar profits, but who are contented with 5 or 6 per cent on their investment, and, according to Mr. Spillman, Chief of the Office of Farm Management, Department of Agriculture, get on an average of $142 in cash, $260 in fuel and house rent—a total of $402—as the annual earnings of a family of four and six-tenths persons. The farmer works not 7 hours a day; he and his family work early and late, many of them 16 hours, Sundays included.

The Government clerk who draws one or two thousand dollars salary, who has his Sundays free and 72 days' leave with pay, who, if all his leave is taken, works on an average, excluding Sundays, of less than 6 hours a day, gets $120 increase of salary. All agree that with the high cost of living clerks must necessarily be paid more salary than they have been paid in the past. The only contention as to the increase in hours was that now, in time of war, in these strenuous times when all are expected to do their bit, might they not be required to give an additional hour to work each day when paid for that hour, or the $120 increase as provided in the bill? The President thought not, and returned the bill without his approval. If no additional burdens are now to be placed upon them in consideration of the $120 increase in salary, and if most exorbitant profits are to be tolerated in the various lines of industry, I fail to see the justice in denying the small increase in price of wheat to the farmer, who works from 10 to 16 hours per day, who receives, according to Mr. Spillman's statement, only, on an average, $402 as the annual earnings of a family of four and six-tenths persons, who pays out of that small earning not only local, county, State, and Federal taxes but who is and who has been required under the law to pay his share of one-half of the taxes of the city of Washington. I fail to see why, under existing conditions, the farmer selling his wheat in Philadelphia should be denied the small increase of 4 cents per bushel of wheat, or the farmer selling his wheat in New York should be denied the increase of 3½ cents per bushel, which in amount would be less than 20 cents on a barrel of flour, or less than 1 cent for every 30 loaves of bread to the consumer.

Railroads have been granted unusual and unheard-of compensation. As a result, freight and passenger rates have been increased and $900,000,000 have been added to the burdens of the American people, a large portion of it to be paid by the farmer. The price of his cattle and hogs has been fixed through arrangements by the packer and the Food Administration. As a result, the farmers have been feeding and marketing their cattle at a loss, while four meat packers, so vigorously and eloquently defended by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], have under Government regulations in the three war years, 1915–1917, increased their profits over $120,000,000 over prewar profits. Morris & Co. made 263.7 per cent profit on its three million capital outstanding for the fiscal year ending November 1, 1917. Yes; and Mr. "Consumer," I am told, to-day pays 60 cents per pound for sirloin steak here under the shadow of the dome of the National Capitol.

The water power, our most valuable resource, valued at many billions of dollars, is to be disposed of most likely without compensation. Just why all of this, I know not. I take it that it is fair to assume that conditions here are the same as in other countries, or as stated by Sir Adam Beck, page 716, part 3, of the Water Power Hearings: "The war, of course, is an 'excuse' for many things. I am afraid it is an excuse for many things in our country and perhaps you are similarly affected. Many things are justified and overlooked at this time in Canada because of the war. There is a spirit of greed prevailing the world over and men have little regard for efficiency or for the ultimate good of the people or anything else other than they want to see some quick money coming their way, easy money; and I am afraid a lot of them are getting it."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it has just been announced that the President of the United States is about to fix the price of cotton. I hear that this is to be done notwithstanding the long, loud, and anguished protests of the gentlemen who produce cotton and the gentlemen who represent the cotton-producing States. Those of us in the North who have felt the benevolent hand of the Government in fixing the price of wool and of wheat can appreciate the anguish of those gentlemen. They have our sympathy, but I can not refrain from commending the President of the United States and his advisors for this belated and necessary act of justice. I have always felt that any attempt arbitrarily and by governmental action to fix the prices must result in certain economic disturbances, both in the operation of the law of supply and demand and in the distribution of the product, but I am convinced that if the circumstances of the case during the last year and a half have justified the fixing of prices of wheat, they even more justify now the fixing of the price upon cotton.

I want to present some statistical matter which I think conclusively proves the necessity and the justice of this action on the part of the President of the United States.

When a year and a half ago we brought up for consideration the food-control bill in this House, the House was told that there was a shortage of wheat, and that shortage came at a time when there was the greatest demand in the world for food, for wheat, for bread, limited only by the necessities of our allies and ourselves in the prosecution of the war. That same situation exists to-day in the case of cotton and has existed for more than a year. I want to give some comparative statistics touching the production of wheat during the last four years and the four years preceding the war and the same statistical basis touching the production of cotton. In 1915 the production of wheat was 130 per cent of the average production of wheat for the preceding four years. In the same year the production of cotton was 75 per cent. In 1916 the wheat crop was 85 per cent of the production for the period to which I have referred. In the same year the production of cotton was 76.7 per cent. In 1917 the per cent for wheat was 86 per cent and for cotton 73 per cent. In 1918 we have a crop equivalent to 119 per cent of the average for the four years preceding the war and for cotton a production this year of 74.6 per cent of the average for the four years preceding the war. Reduced to bushels and bales the total production of wheat for the crop years 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918 shows an increase, when compared with the total crop of the preceding four years, of 205,530,000 bushels, while the total production of cotton for 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, compared with the production for the preceding four years, showed a decrease of production amounting to 14,859,000 bales, a decrease in the cotton crop during the past four years equivalent to the average crop for any year during the preceding four years.

In other words, while during the last four years we have had an actual surplus of wheat as compared with the average for the preceding four years we have had during the same period an actual decrease in the production of cotton equivalent to almost 15,000,000 bales. How any man who has any elemental sense of justice can under those conditions justify the fixing of a maximum price upon wheat while cotton is permitted to soar without limit except the sky and the cupidity of the men who raise it and the profiteerer who uses it for his own advantage I can not understand.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to go on with these figures, and I have only 10 minutes.

I desire to refer just a moment to the price. The price of wheat during the month of August this year was 140 per cent higher than the average price during the four-year period before the war to which I have referred. The price of wheat during the month of August this year was 35 per cent higher than the average for the years 1915. 1916, and 1917. The price of cotton during August of this year—and I am speaking now of the farm values—was 217 per cent higher than the average price for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914, and was 65 per cent higher than the price for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. In other words, the price of cotton during the last four years of the war, under a great shortage, it is true, has been very much higher comparatively than the price of wheat. If there ever was a justification for fixing a maximum price for wheat or wool there is infinitely more justification now for the fixing of a maximum price upon cotton, and has been for more than a year and a half last past.

If the price of cotton is fixed at a point comparable with the fixed price of wheat, in its ratio to the average price of wheat during the four years preceding the war, the price of cotton to-day could not exceed to the farmer 25 cents a pound.

Of course, if we are to proceed upon the theory that prices are to be fixed by unrestricted competition, a high price for cotton would be justified by the existing shortage. We have abandoned this theory of unrestricted competition as to wool and wheat, and in its place have adopted a policy of Government price fixing coupled with governmental control of distribution.

It is not fair to make fish of wheat and fowl of cotton. If the shortage of wheat which existed last year, and which no longer exists, justifies the continuance of a fixed maximum price on wheat, the shortage of cotton, which is and has been very much greater than that of wheat, certainly now justifies the adoption of the latter policy with respect to cotton.

I conclude by again congratulating the administration upon this belated act of justice to the wheat farmer, the wool grower, the consumer, our soldiers abroad, and the allies who fight with us for the liberties of humanity and the democracy of the world.

I append the statistical basis upon which my remarks have been based:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of tobacco and the methods of tobacco production and handling, $32,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry first. Is it in order to move to strike out any of these paragraphs?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, providing for the investigation and improvement of tobacco and methods of production and handling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. On what page?

Mr. WALSH. The paragraph just read, for the investigation and improvement of tobacco and methods of tobacco production and handling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has a copy of the President's message, and it is the only one I have. The Clerk is reading from the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I make the motion in this form, to strike out:

For the investigation and improvement of tobacco and the methods of tobacco production and handling, $32,000.

That is found on page 13, at the bottom of the page, of House Document No. 1229.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 6, noes 28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $242,320. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, shall upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided, also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $3,137,038.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to inquire as to this congressional seed item, whether the conferees left it at the same amount as it passed the House? You will recall there was quite a discussion in the House, and the effort was made to raise the amount so as to accord Members of Congress the same number of packages of seed as heretofore, which required an increase in the amount of the appropriation because of the higher price of seed.

Mr. LEVER. We left it at the same amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. So there will be fewer packages for Members to distribute next year than in prior years?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the number of packages that will be available to be distributed by Members of Congress? As I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], he sought to increase the appropriation one-third, based on the increased cost. So I assume the number will be reduced one-third of the number of packages heretofore received.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman will yield, I have been advised we will get 10,000 packages of vegetable seed and 3,000 of flower seed.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask whether the gentleman is lamenting or rejoicing?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will recall that I was of valuable assistance to the gentleman in his effort to demand in the House a separate roll call to keep the appropriation as it was. I am surprised at the gentleman's memory.

Mr. WALSH. I know the gentleman has quick changes of mind sometimes.

Mr. STAFFORD. On matters of economy the gentleman knows that I seldom change my mind.

The Clerk read as follows:

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals and supplies, repairs to apparatus, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, and all other expenses, employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as may be considered necessary for the purposes named, and rent outside of the District of Columbia; and to cooperate with associations and scientific societies in the revision of the United States Pharmacopœia and development of methods of analysis, $589,081.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PLATT. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. Is there anything in this bill in connection with this investigation by the Bureau of Chemistry or elsewhere for the promotion of the brewing industry? Is there anything under the growing of hops, for instance, that used to be carried in agricultural appropriation bills?

Mr. LEVER. No; there is not.

Mr. PLATT. In this item, on page 13, I notice reference is made to fermentation investigators, $58,000.

Mr. LEVER. That may apply to molasses and all kinds of things. It has no reference at all to beer or hops or anything of that kind.

Mr. PLATT. The situation has changed a little since this bill was originally proposed. I thought if there were anything in there that had special reference to that particular industry it ought to come out.

Mr. LEVER. That is true. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Committee on Agriculture is known to be composed exclusively of Members who have been "dry" for a number of years.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For farmers' cooperative demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $554,800.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture how much is the total provided in this bill for the eradication or control of the cotton-boll weevil, or in any wise relating to that particular enterprise?

Mr. LEVER. That is the entire matter. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. There may be a small appropriation carried under the head of the Bureau of Entomology for the study of the boll weevel itself, but it will be a very small amount.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the largest appropriation made for any agricultural product, or which is expected to be expended toward aiding any agricultural product. Therefore among the agricultural products of importance in this country this is the most expensive to the Government. It is the one outstanding important agricultural product that neither pays a tax nor is controlled in its marketing or in its price by the Government.

I have supported this in former bills and I may now support it, notwithstanding my motion to-day, because I am in favor of encouraging all legitimate agricultural enterprises and products. But, as I said before, it is the only one of the large agricultural products of this country that is neither subjected to market conditions nor price control and which absolutely refuses to pay a tax. It is one of the two agricultural products designed for use in the production of clothing. One is raised in the North, upon the backs of the sheep, and the other is raised in the South from the cotton plant. "Gossypium malyacaea" is the scientific name which, translated by a Member, means "I shall be immune." Or in the light of recent events might be read "sole slacker of the soil." The wool that is raised on the backs of the sheep in the North is denied protection at our ports. The administration commandeers that wool and fixes a definite price at which it may be sold. Neither has been done with reference to cotton. This discrimination in favor of cotton and against wool is a direct reversal of the divine attitude of that early day when the flock products of Abel were preferred to the soil products of Cain.

Cotton is also unlike the wheat of the North, the price of which is fixed in the markets of the Nation, and those of the world are denied to the producers.

When the Congress of the United States was bold enough to believe that it still retained sufficient legislative authority to say the American farmer was entitled to have a 20-cent (9 per cent) raise on his wheat we were met by a veto containing the remarkable statement that the raise from $2.20 to $2.40 would raise the $10.50 barrel of flour $2, or to $12.50. According to mathematics as most of us were taught, it would mean a difference of 95 cents per barrel. But so many new rules have presented themselves to the Northwestern farmers that the repeal of "gravitation" might not startle them.

That veto alone was the cause for holding up this bill for a period of nearly three months, during which time all the new enterprises involved in this bill have been necessarily suspended from July 1, 1918, till whatever date this bill shall be signed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto may close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto may close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will have to object to that. I want 10 or 15 or 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas objects. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I merely want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is rather unfortunate to bring up the question of fixing a price on cotton just at this time when the farmers are selling it?

Mr. SLOAN. I was speaking historically. I was not referring to the price of cotton now or later. My objection is to the selection of one great agricultural product, and neither fixing its price, controlling its price, nor in any wise controlling its market, when every other important agricultural product in the United States has its price fixed or its market controlled.

The question was asked the other day, when the cotton tax was being considered, why we should not as well place a tax upon corn as upon cotton—put them on the same basis. It is entirely proper that that should be done. The administration has placed its hand upon corn in two respects:

First, in confining the quotations on speculative corn away under the limit of the cash price for which it was being sold. Second, in the use to which the corn has been put, especially in the production of pork and beef. This has been controlled, first, in denying to pork and beef free access to the palates of the American people which would sustain a natural market. Second, by the creation of a standard of carcasses different from that which had been the standard on the American markets for the last 30 years. The administration selected the light beef of the Argentine type or the southern type, instead of the finished beef which is the ordinary steer of from 1,300 to 1,600 pounds. This last was over a year ago encouraged by the Food Administration to be developed to the last pound capable of being placed upon the carcass, so that for a given number of live beeves we might have a large amount of beef produced. The market spread of price between the heavy and the new light standard was very small by reason of that created and controlled market. Out of that grew the insolvency and bankruptcy of a large number of the beef and pork producers of the United States.

Now, it seems to me that this one industry here, the cotton industry, so richly endowed, with $650,000 for its protection, should not object to being controlled either in its markets or in its prices. Or it should have gracefully submitted to a reasonable tax being placed upon it. There is no reason why an aristocracy of agricultural products should be established and maintained in this country, any more than there should be an aristocracy among men.

Further, the steel which is dug out of the earth and purified in the fervent heat caused and controlled by wasting labor is controlled in distribution and, therefore, in price. The coal which is drawn from the earth is distributed and priced as the administration wills. Why, then, should not cotton be market or price controlled by the administration and in default thereof taxed by Congress?

Moreover, there has been from one-half billion to three-fourths of a billion dollars, in effect, thrown into the sea by the perverse opposition of cotton Congressmen refusing to permit a reasonable import duty being collected upon the $3,000,000,000 worth of goods coming through our ports during the last fiscal year. It was said of old: "Let those who prevent their country's benefit be required to present an equivalent."

The Clerk read as follows:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $650,140: Provided, That the expense of such service shall be defrayed from this appropriation and such cooperative funds as may be voluntarily contributed by State, county, and municipal agencies, associations of farmers, and individual farmers, universities, colleges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, other local associations of business men, business organizations, and individuals within the State.

Mr. SLOAN offers the following amendment: Page 34, strike out the following:

"For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $650,140: Provided, That the expense of such service shall be defrayed from this appropriation and such cooperative funds as may be voluntarily contributed by State, county, and municipal agencies, associations of farmers, and individual farmers, universities, colleges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, other local associations of business men, business organizations, and individuals within the State."

By unanimous consent, Mr. SLOAN was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SLOAN. I withdraw the motion, with the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the motion will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Public Roads, $593,540.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, including the grain sorghums, for the purpose of fixing definite grades thereof, $92,750.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to be advised as to this item "for investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain," and so forth, "$92,750." How is that used?

Mr. LEVER. That is used in an effort to fix standard grades for various kinds of grain, wheat, oats, corn, sorghum, and so forth. It is a technical investigation for fixing the grades.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman know how much of that amount is used in the bureau in Washington and how much for outside work?

Mr. LEVER. I do not have it at hand at this minute, but I can put it in the RECORD.

Mr. NORTON. There is a further appropriation in the bill of $456,580 to carry out the provisions of the United States grain-standard act. That seems to be a duplication of appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. No; one is for the enforcement of the grain-standard act and the other is for investigation work with a view to fixing standards. There is no duplication.

Mr. NORTON. It occurs to me that these are large appropriations for that class of work.

Mr. LEVER. They are large appropriations; the grain-standard act requires a large amount for the administration of it.

Mr. NORTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To make surveys to determine the actual distribution of the pink bollworm in Mexico and to exterminate local infestations in Mexico near the border of the United States, in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, $25,000.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I intended to place in the RECORD yesterday a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, but it was the information of some gentlemen that we might be able to get through with the bill then, so I did not interfere.

There are several bills in the Committee on Public Lands providing for some manner of homestead on waste land or reclaimed arid land throughout the United States for the accommodation of and to help the home-coming soldiers.

We all recollect what a magnificient thing it was when that grand old Pennsylvania statesman, Galusha A. Grow, championed the homestead act after the Civil War, and what he did for the development of that great central producing granary of the world, which is to-day sustaining the fighting forces on the front in France. And what wonders we may do now for our heroes of to-day if we start in time! I am having read a letter from a soldier indicating a desire to have it done, and a letter from the Secretary of the Interior indicating his willingness to proceed.

I do not know who the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands may be, but I assume that he is active and I assume also that legislation is in process. I know they are all good men on the committee, and all I wish to do is to rather suggest, by the reading of these two letters, the propriety of speeding up a little, as it may take a long time to formulate a plan, because we can not do it as they did in the homestead act, because there was the land ready for occupancy, but now it must be found in different sections.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am advised that the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands is the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and that he is active. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Very active in political irrigation. [Laughter.] As far as his own district is concerned, we are not objecting as to how well he irrigates, but we can only wish him failure elsewhere. That is political, but what I want to do is something about this matter. This is not an original suggestion of mine, but one comes from one of my constituents and the other matter I wish inserted is a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, making suggestions to me. There is no politics in it, but I hope a great broad plan, something grand and noble, a worthy provision for the Yankee Doodle boys who are saving the world to-day.

Now, I would like to have the Clerk, in that compelling, sonorous voice of his, read the letters.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHEMICAL BATTALION, EDGEWOOD ARSENAL,
Edgewood, Md., September 2, 1918.

Hon. B. K. FOCHT,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Am engaged here at present as a chemist in the Lear gas plant, which I must say is undesirable work. The place since it has been completed to a certain degree rather appeals to me. My only regrets are that at present prospects for advancement are small and no possible chance of going over to France, both of which were held out for inducements when I applied for induction papers for this branch of the service. However, I am an optimist, and have consolation in the fact that I believe the Germans will soon realize their ambitions and expectations to be absurd and bring the war to a close.

Now, in view of the fact that we are working with chlorine gas here continually and our lungs will be susceptible to the tuberculosis germ after we leave here, there are four of us fellows who intend to go West on farms and discontinue our prewar occupations.

Would you be kind enough to give me information regarding homesteads assigned by the Government, and what kind of inducements do they give for developing the land? Would the Government make any special inducements to soldiers such as a few of the South American countries?

Each of our company of four men has been raised on a farm, and at present I see no reason why we could not be successful in a business adventure of this kind.

Hoping that you may be able to give me first-hand information regarding this, and thanking you for the same, I remain,

Respectfully, Pvt. F. R. BEMIADERFER,
C. W. S. N. A.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 18, 1918.

Hon. B. K. FOCHT,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FOCHT: I have your letter of September 5, inclosing one from Pvt. Bemisderfer, requesting information as to the plan for providing farms for returning soldiers. I am sending you all the information we have available on this subject. The plan, however, has not proceeded far enough along to be able to give any definite information to the soldiers, but such letters as Mr. Bemisderfer's evidence a necessity for this sort of a scheme, and I have to suggest that it would be a good thing if you would have this soldier's letter printed in the RECORD. In this connection, I am sending you a copy of a letter which I have also received from Sergt. Robert E. Graham.

Cordially, yours, F. K. LANE.

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE, August 10, 1918.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE.

DEAR SIR: Having read in a French newspaper of your proposed grant of farming land to returned soldiers, I would like to make an application for any program or printed matter you have on same. Am a man with family and am in the hospital now, recovering from wounds received at the front, to which I expect to return shortly.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Respectfully,

(Signed) SERGT. ROBT. E. GRAHAM,
Company E, Sixth United States Engineers,
American Expeditionary Forces, France.

WHERE HE WAS AT.

A certain British soldier's letter, according to Punch, runs thus:

"I am sorry I can not tell you where I am, because I am not allowed to say. But I venture to state that I am not where I was, but where I was before I left here to go where I have just come from."

PUTTING COUNTY WEEKLIES OUT OF BUSINESS.

THE NORTHERN NEW YORK PRESS ASSOCIATION,
Canton, N. Y.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read your remarks regarding news-print paper and the country weekly. I am glad the country weekly found a champion. You have earned their thanks.

Country weeklies depend on farmers for subscribers. Farmers seldom pay on receipt of bills. Agents are necessary. Four years ago when we began to manufacture munitions all those who were willing to accept the wages that weeklies could pay agents previous to that time suddenly decamped to the factories. Since then it has been impossible to secure agents. That has been going on for four years. We have had to depend on bills mailed, and responses have not been gratifying.

At the same time we have had to advance our rates to meet higher costs. The competition from city dailies has doubled because they can handle big war news. The advance and competition have tended to lessen subscriptions.

In attempting to collect by mail we have seen our clerks and "front-office helpers" enlist and go to the draft. The "old man" has staid to do the work of two and three.

We have lost railroad, automobile, and tire advertising. Our coal and feed dealers no longer advertise. Our local merchants are slacking up. In every town where there is not some war industry the job work is cut in half. We long ago cut our lists to the limit to save as much as possible.

To-day farmers can not pay. Agents can not be had. Office help can not be had. We are four years short in intensive collections because of the war We are adding to already great burdens by serving on war committees.

We can only comply with the cash request or demand by simply cutting off delinquents and placing the accounts in the hands of attorneys at a terrific loss of cash and friends. It reduces our circulation 50 per cent. It ruins our advertising rates. It ruins 50 per cent of the country weeklies forever, for a temporary saving.

So far as I can learn the editors who met with the commission were editors of daily papers who issue weeklies on the side. In this vicinity many weekly editions of dailies have been discontinued already. The persons best competent to set forth the weekly side are the publishers of real weeklies.

One branch of the administration is demanding the cutting down of the weekly. Another is urging them to adopt a book premium on training camp activities published by the War Department. Still another is supplying plate matter for raising money to send the "local" paper to every man in the service.

The present price of news alone will suspend the publication of 15 per cent of the weeklies. What more can be asked.

By attempting to cut down honest weeklies 15 per cent and insisting on a further immense reduction of circulation because of the cash idea, the Government will lose 50 per cent of its rural publicity.

The only one to gain by killing the weekly is the daily. I just want to thank you again for what you said.

Yours, truly,

WILLISTON MANLEY, President.

MANUFACTURERS' RECORD,
Baltimore, September 18, 1918.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having just read a copy of your speech on the shortage of news-print paper, under date of August 27, I inclose an editorial from the Manufacturers' Record of last week showing that the War Industries Board denies to country papers the privilege of paying for subscriptions to other papers in advertising. In other words, a paper which might wish to carry an advertisement in payment for the subscription for another paper can not do so. This, I think, is carrying the matter even further than any point raised in your speech.

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD H. EDMONDS,
Editor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, $27,875,353.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 11 minutes, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to have 5 minutes, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] to have 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was surprised and pained by the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]. His attempt at a time like this to play politics by appealing to sectional prejudice is indeed out of place and in very bad taste. He charges that several camps and cantonments have been established in the South for political and sectional reasons. His untrue charge is unwarranted from every fact in the case.

Every informed man knows that these camps and cantonments were located in the South mainly because of the climate and not for any sectional or political reason. I regret that such a suggestion should have been made by this Republican Member from Pennsylvania.

He complains that $60,000,000 have been expended in Alabama for the benefit of our boys in uniform, but he says nothing of the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent in his State for war purposes. The gentleman complains that a few million dollars have been spent for war purposes in the Southern States, but fails to tell this House and the country that more money is spent for war purposes in the State of Pennsylvania alone than the entire cost of all the camps and cantonments in all the Southern States.

Then, why should the gentleman from Pennsylvania make such a statement?

In view of the fact that hundreds of millions are being expended by the Government in northern States where all the gun factories and shipyards are located, I must confess that when I hear the gentleman attacking my section of the country as he has done to-day I fear that he is willing to do violence to the truth of the situation and create a sectional prejudice—even at a time like this—if by doing so he can serve a partisan purpose.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROBBINS, a Republican, was indulging in an attack upon the administration for locating some of the cantonments in the South, I thought of the speech of another Republican, Mr. REAVIS, of Nebraska, who has just returned from France, and who praised the boys from the South as he did the boys from the North. He did not try to deceive the country into believing that the South had been singled out for special favors in the expenditures of war funds. He seemed to be trying to contribute to the unity of purpose and solidarity of the American people.

He told how the Alabama boys and the Iowa boys, fighting side by side, were sending terror into the ranks of the brutal Hun.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] seemed to be trying to serve a partisan purpose, while the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] seemed to be trying to serve his country.

Mr. Chairman, surely the people of the great and patriotic State of Pennsylvania do not indorse the unwarranted inappropriate, untimely, and unpatriotic attack that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made upon the administration to-day.

Surely the good people of Pennsylvania will not indorse his attempt to array one section of the country against another. The man who undertakes to create prejudice in the minds of the people of one section against the people of another may help himself politically, but he is injuring his country. The man here at home who now undertakes to create a feeling of sectional bitterness amongst our people while our brave boys from every section are fighting side by side in defense of our country is an enemy to our country, I do not care whether he is a Democrat or Republican.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] was unfair to the cotton producers of the South in including in his comparison of five years of cotton prices with wheat prices of the year 1914. When the war broke out in Europe in 1914 wheat advanced in price and cotton fell down from 14 to 6 cents a pound, a loss of $40 a bale and $640,000,000 on that crop, while the price of wheat was higher.

I call the gentleman's attention to this because the comparison that he made does an injustice to the cotton producers. The comparison for five years prior to 1914 will show that wheat has advanced in price more than cotton. I am the friend of the wheat producer and voted to allow him an increase in price.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] suggests that cotton is exempt from taxation and price fixing. When the gentleman suggests the taxing of cotton he invites a tax on all agricultural products, on every bushel of grain, and on every bale of hay produced in his section of the country. Do the farmers out there want that? I am opposed to such a tax.

The gentleman says we seized wool and fixed the price. He is mistaken in that. The truth is the wool seller agreed with the Government as to the price.

And let me say here that if it is necessary to fix the price of cotton to help win the war, the South is ready for the price to be fixed, and the South will be satisfied if those who have cotton to sell are permitted to have a voice in fixing the price as those who had wool to sell were permitted to have a say in fixing the price of wool. The only fear that we have had is that an unprofitable price might be fixed and, if so, bring bankruptcy and ruin to the cotton producers of the South.

I do not mean to say that an unprofitable price would be fixed intentionally, because we feel that the administration would be as fair to cotton as it was to wheat and steel and wool if it knew the cost of cotton production. All we ask is a fair deal and we expect to get that. Some of you gentlemen do not know it, but cotton is our money crop, and with it we buy grain and meat and mules from the West, and if the purchasing power of the produce is destroyed your grain and meat and mule market is destroyed in the South and you deprive us of the power to do our part in buying liberty bonds, and surely, gentlemen, you do not wish to do that.

Gentlemen, I trust that there will be no more appeals to sectional prejudice during this war.

To-day, while I speak to you, boys from every section of our country are fighting and dying on the battle front in France. They do not ask about the politics of a comrade or "Does your State pay more taxes than mine?" The only thing that they want to know is, Are you fighting for the flag? [Applause.] Thank God, none of these partisan Republicans can say a word against the valor and heroism of the American soldier from the South.

Go ask the machine-gun men from Wisconsin and Michigan about the courage and daring of the Alabama Infantry and they will tell you, "We feel perfectly safe when supporting their lead; we know that the enemy will never break through." [Applause.]

In the name of the boys whose blood is being shed this day, and in the name of all that we hold dear, I beg you, gentlemen, to banish partisan politics and put country, liberty, and humanity first, and all will be well. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the press of Friday, I think, contained a statement that in my judgment ought not to have been inserted on an inner page, but should have been given a prominent position on the first page, with large headlines, because it is the record of a notable event in the progress of the war.

It was to the effect that France, like the United States, is offering to her people a new loan to obtain funds for the vigorous prosecution of her successful war activities. That country has been in war for a little more than four years, and yet the public authorities in France, depending upon the patriotism and courage of her people, are offering to them a loan on a 4 per cent basis. It will undoubtedly be subscribed more than in full.

It seems to me that we in the Congress of the United States should take public notice of the devotion and courage of a people who, having borne as an important part of the theater of war, its heavy burdens for more than four years, have still the confidence which leads to victory. The unconquerable spirit of that gallant people encourages its public authorities to offer the loan on such terms as 4 per cent, with every confidence that the country, so burdened, so devastated, so worn with war, will take the loan in full.

This act of France is an indication of her confidence, determination, and steadfastness, commanding our respect and love, not only for her own sake, but as our full worthy ally. Not only her soldiers but her people fight in the full tide of endeavor. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. NORTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. WALSH. Is this all on the bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to make a statement on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CRISP having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SISSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12714) and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the special orders allotting time to gentlemen to speak after the reading of the Journal on Monday I may be permitted to speak for 30 minutes on the benefits of the draft law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that after the expiration of the special order allowing Members to address the House next Monday he may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether there were special orders made this morning? As I recall it, those were not agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. They were agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. And it was understood that the other Agricultural bill was coming up?

Mr. MADDEN. Permissions were given to three Members to address the House next Monday.

Mr. TREADWAY. Do those follow the Agricultural bill?

Mr. MADDEN. They come first.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is another bill on the calendar from the Agricultural Committee, and I am going to object to any further speech making until the bill is taken up and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. RUBEY. I will have to object until we pass the Agricultural bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not object. I do not often inflict myself on the House.

Mr. RUBEY. I will have to object. We have another important bill here.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. RUBEY. And we ought to pass it. It will take only 30 minutes to pass it here.

Mr. MADDEN. I have not been standing in the way of the passage of any bills here. If the gentleman wants to object to this request, of course he can object.

Mr. RUBEY. If this House will fix a time when we can vote on the prohibition proposition, and have it definitely fixed, I am willing then to let these gentlemen speak. That is a proposition I think we ought to vote on, and Members of this House ought to have an opportunity to vote on it at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I am anxious that you should have that opportunity, and I am not going to put anything in the way of giving you that opportunity. I have stood here and helped in everything that you wanted to do.

Mr. RUBEY. I appreciate that.

Mr. LEVER. Will my friend from Missouri yield?

Mr. RUBEY. I have not the floor.

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that——

Mr. MADDEN. I will cut it to 20 minutes if that will be of any use.

Mr. LEVER. I am satisfied that if we can all work together here we can easily pass the food-production bill on next Monday. The best way to do is for all of us to keep in good humor. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will not object to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I can assure the gentleman from Missouri that I shall undertake to keep a quorum here on Monday until the food-production bill is passed, even if it takes until midnight.

Mr. MADDEN. I would be perfectly willing to have the House meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. RUBEY. With that assurance, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks that at the conclusion of the special order next Monday he be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I said "30 minutes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To address the House for 30 minutes. The Chair understood the gentleman to say "20 minutes." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no slip up in the passage of this legislation on Monday, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this afternoon it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock Monday morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this afternoon it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock Monday morning. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 4194.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (S. 4194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHOUSE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 23, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have assembled once more in Thy presence. We have come out of our day of rest, a day that holds within its sacred bounds our highest and sweetest memories and our divinest aspirations. We have come out of the touch of sacred things to face once more the increasing obligations of life. We pray that Thy blessings may be upon us, that, with chastened spirit and with unyielding will and with courage sufficient for the testing time to which we have come, we may address ourselves to the tasks that await us in the fear of God and with Thy blessing. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House.

ACTION OF CAPITAL ISSUES COMMITTEE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, some days ago I referred to the disposition made of an application of a corporation in my State for certain credit before the Capital Issues Committee. I am in receipt of a letter from the chairman of the Capital Issues Committee, Charles S. Hamlin, calling my attention to the specific application and the reasons for its disposition, which differs somewhat from my understanding of the affair. I therefore ask leave to insert in the RECORD, without reading, the letter of Mr. Hamlin addressed to myself upon that subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPITAL ISSUES COMMITTEE,
NATIONAL METROPOLITAN BANK BUILDING,
Washington, September 20, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: My attention has been called to your remarks during the discussion of the mineral-products bill in the Senate, as reported on page 10185 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which you refer to the Capital Issues Committee, stating that—

"Speaking broadly and generally, the Capital Issues Committee will not sanction the issuance of securities to companies designed to promote and develop minerals of the several sorts mentioned in the bill. * * * My colleague and I had occasion to go with a couple of our constituents from Boulder County to the Capital Issues Committee within the past two weeks. The gentlemen are engaged in the production of tungsten, one of the materials mentioned in this bill. * * * The proposition was turned down upon the ground that the industry contemplated in the enterprise was of a speculative character."

From my recollection of the matter referred to—the application of the Tungsten Products Mining Co.—I was confident that the case had not been decided on the grounds indicated by your statement, for the reason that it is no part of the policy of the Capital Issues Committee to disapprove an issue of securities solely because an enterprise is speculative in character. However, I have since consulted the file in this case and refreshed my memory by discussing the matter with Mr. J. S. Drum, a member of the committee, and I should like to correct what I believe to be your misunderstanding of the matter.

Practically every application that comes before this committee respecting the issuance of securities by a development company presents two distinct aspects—the economic and the financial. The former is concerned with the need of increased output of a given product and the latter with the methods of obtaining and using the necessary capital. In other words, the economic necessity of increased production is not the only factor to be considered in determining whether any issue of securities is compatible with the national interest; the financial structure and methods must be sound in order to avoid waste and loss.

The application of the Tungsten Products Mining Co. related to the sale to the general public of not less than $750,000 of the capital stock of this company to obtain money with which to buy and develop additional tungsten-ore bodies and to provide working capital. It was not shown that the incorporators, although reliable, substantial, and highly trained men, were investing any substantial amount of their own capital in the enterprise in which they were asking the public to put its money. The committee can not approve the sale of stock to the general public under these conditions, regardless of the purposes for which the proceeds will be used.

It appeared also that the newly organized mining company was expected to finance the Tungsten Products Co., which is owned by the incorporators of the mining company. In the opinion of the committee, there seems to be no urgent reason at the present time, from the point of view of the national interest, for the incorporation of the mining company to take over the ore properties and refining plant of the products company or to finance the latter, especially in view of advices we received from the Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, to the effect that there is a surplus of tungsten refinipg capacity in the country.

I am sorry, indeed, that you had to leave the conference with Mr. Drum, which you attended in company with Senator SHAFROTH and representatives of this company, because Mr. Drum tells me that he had not finished his discussion of the factors involved and that this probably accounts for your understanding that the application was disapproved because it was speculative in character. Many necessary enterprises are inherently speculative in character but are passed favorably by this committee nevertheless when there is need for increased output of the product in question and when the financial structure is such as to give proper assurances to the committee that economic waste will not result.

Very truly, yours, C. S. HAMLIN.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Embry Tobacco Co., of Quincy, Fla., praying for protection for small corporations who have invested capital of less than $400,000, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to which was referred the bill (S. 4637) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 574) thereon.

SARAH A. STAPLIN.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 308, submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE on the 21st instant, reported it favorably without amendment and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Sarah A. Staplin, sister of William Gardiner, late assistant clerk to the Committee on Pacific Railroads of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 4954) providing for the protection of the users of the telephone and telegraph service and properties and funds belonging thereto during the governmental operation and control; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4955) to authorize the establishment of a fisheries experiment station on the coast of Washington; to the Committee on Fisheries.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 4956) to authorize the President of the United States to reappoint Seth William Schofield major of cavalry; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII will be proceeded with.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 1419, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. ASHURST. This is calendar Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is calendar Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I gave notice on Saturday that at the close of the morning business to-day I would address the Senate on certain features of the revenue bill. If the rule which specially assigns the morning hour on Monday for calendar business interferes with that notice I shall, of course, not insist upon proceeding.

Mr. FLETCHER. I withdraw the motion I made.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII be dispensed with until the Senator from Colorado can deliver his address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, before the Senator from Colorado proceeds I think it is advisable for me to make some announcement in regard to House joint resolution 200, which I gave notice heretofore would be taken up on Thursday of this week. A report has been circulated somewhat extensively in the press in the last day or two to the effect that in all probability the woman suffrage amendment would not be reached on next Thursday. I desire to state that so far as I know it will be reached. There is no plan made of which I have any knowledge to postpone the consideration of that measure, and from all the information which I can gather I know of no obstacle which will prevent its consideration at that time.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I certainly have no objection to the request for unanimous consent the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has asked for, but I promised a number of Senators that I would assist them in securing the regular order for Calendar Monday. There is no business on the calendar whatever in which I am especially interested, but I think a quorum ought to be present, so that if any Senators wish to object they may have an opportunity to do so. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smoot
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sterling
Brandegee	Kellogg	Phelan	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Culberson	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Cummins	Lewis	Ransdell	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lodge	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Fall	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh
Fernald	McNary	Shields	Wilfley
Fletcher	Martin, Ky.	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Guion	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BENET] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] on account of illness, I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Arkansas

[Mr. ROBINSON] are detained on important business. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NORRIS and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. DREW, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. CURTIS and Mr. KIRBY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4543) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4722) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 4723) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12714) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12714. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the rule of the Senate requiring that the calendar shall be called this morning may be dispensed with until the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at a meeting of the Joint Committee on Printing this morning it was decided to instruct the Public Printer that hereafter the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be printed upon news-print paper instead of calendered paper, as it is printed to-day, and also that our calendar of business shall be printed upon news-print instead of calendered paper, as it is to-day. I wish to say that it becomes absolutely a necessity to do so, and not only a necessity to do so, but we are going to have a very hard time even to get the news-print paper to continue printing the 33,500 copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I wish to state that this will save the Government between two and three thousand dollars a day in the cost of paper alone. I wanted to say that much, because there has been objection, of course, in the past to printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on news-print paper.

In this connection I wish to state that the bound volumes of the RECORD will be printed with calendered paper as they are printed at present, but all copies of the RECORD that are sent out daily to Senators and Representatives will hereafter be printed upon news-print paper.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the financial needs of the Government, consequent upon the war with Germany, and the constitutional requirement that bills for revenue shall originate with the House have recently imposed upon the Ways and Means Committee of that body the most gigantic task it ever encountered. An estimated expenditure of $24,000,000,000 for the current year and the desire of the administration to realize one-third of the amount by taxation has necessitated the framing of a measure designed to raise the vast sum of $8,000,000,000 per annum without seriously disturbing the industries or menacing the commerce of the Nation. These figures are nearly one and a half times the total supply of our currency, including gold, silver, nickel, copper, and paper. It represents about 4 per cent of our estimated wealth. It exceeds the combined value of our imports and exports for any year of our history. It would much more than liquidate the money cost of our Civil War on both sides. It will subject the industries of the Nation to a supreme test of endurance. It will virtually absorb the annual profits of production, and must be made to do so, if possible, without discouraging continued productive energy.

We propose by this bill to raise 33⅓ per cent of our war expenses by taxation. This task none of the belligerents has attempted. No nation at war in the past has ever done so, if we except minor conflicts of brief duration from the reckoning. We are the first to make the experiment. If we adhere to it and the war shall endure after 1919, we shall be required to enact other revenue legislation laying heavier taxes, and continue to do so until it shall have terminated, because our war expenditures will increase progressively as the conflict proceeds.

I assume no superior wisdom concerning fiscal affairs. Indeed, I lay claim to but little technical knowledge of financial administration beyond that gained from writers of authority. These tell me that if the revenues of a Government fall below a fair percentage of its bond issues their values are seriously affected and their sale is possible only at a heavy discount. This is logical. They also deprecate large bond issues, and commend the principle of pay as you go for nations as for individuals. No man can challenge the soundness of the doctrine nor the wisdom of adhering to it whenever possible. But exceptions to all rules, whether of conduct or of finance, are bound to occur, and the present world war is an exception to all that has preceded it in human history. We can not, rich as we are, supply our Government through taxation with one-third of the money required for its expenses unless it ends quickly, a contingency which legislators can not assume as probable. But the Government can in a large degree relieve itself of much of its credit requirements, as it has done in the past, as its allies are doing, and as it must do should Germany remain unsubdued a twelvemonth from now.

I do not protest against heavy taxation in times like these. On the contrary, we should impose them as fairly, as uniformly distributed, and as extensively as commerce and industry, as production and consumption, will justify. But we should not, in my judgment, establish a mathematical percentage, based upon estimated expenditures, and make its realization the prime goal of our revenue laws. And this, with the most profound respect for the Treasury Department, the Ways and Means Committee, and some of my colleagues of the Finance Committee, is what we are seeking to do. The result of our action upon the taxpaying interests necessarily assumes a secondary place in our deliberations. Injustice to them, although not intended, must flow from such methods in legislation.

I do not quarrel with preliminary estimates of probable revenues available from different subjects of taxation. These are, of course, essential to any scheme of taxation, and in normal times may well be accepted as standards for adjusting assessments and fixing levies. But in times of unprecedented stress and prodigious outlay it must always be remembered that the integrity of the industrial fabric, in all its subdivisions, is as essential to military success as the Army and the Navy; that to overburden it is to cripple it, and that to cripple it is to invite disaster. As to this we are all agreed; our differences proceed from the result we apprehend from proposed schemes of legislation.

Mr. President, I gravely question the effect which an annual tax roll of $8,000,000,000 will have upon our material interests—agricultural, manufacturing, mining, and commercial—especially as this huge burden is to be distributed by this bill. I question whether after the first year of its operation it will prove efficient or successful. And I am convinced that such an unduly heavy imposition is not a present necessity. I am satisfied that many of those upon whom these taxes are to fall entertain this view who will not express it lest they be reproached with a lack of patriotism and an unwillingness to cheerfully bear their share of the public burdens.

A factor in Federal taxation which can never be overlooked when increases are proposed, but which at times seems to be disregarded, is that it constitutes but a part—a large part, of course, but yet only a part—of the burden falling upon the taxpayer. In addition to them he must pay a State, county, school, and frequently a municipal tax, whose aggregate sum is prodigious. In 1916 the revenues of the States totaled $466,946,748. Those for the other purposes enumerated are very much more. I feel safe in estimating them at $2,000,000,000. These taxes, too, are increasing very rapidly. They must, like other taxes, be paid from the incomes and earnings of the people. To pay them otherwise is to impair capital and reduce the efficiency. Mr. KITCHIN gives the total individual incomes subject to normal tax in 1917 at $4,700,000,000, and corporation incomes for the same period he estimates at $10,000,000,000, or a total of $14,700,000,000. With the enactment of this bill $10,500,000,000 of this income must be used for purposes of general taxation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has given an estimate of individual incomes and an estimate of corporation incomes——

Mr. THOMAS. I have given Mr. KITCHIN's estimate.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. The question I had in mind was this: Are those in any wise duplications? In other words, is the part of individual incomes which might be received from dividends included in both items?

Mr. THOMAS. No; the individual incomes which are given by Mr. KITCHIN are those upon which a surtax only is levied. Less than 30 per cent of this fund will remain with the taxpayer whose needs must absorb a much larger proportion if his earning capacity shall remain unimpaired. Not all of these taxes are directly imposed on income, but they are passed along and ultimately rest upon that form of wealth, for taxes upon consumption, whether direct or indirect, must be finally defrayed from the earnings of the taxpayer.

Moreover, we propose by what we call war-time prohibition to destroy the basis for more than three-fourths of a billion of our proposed revenue. This sum if realized must, therefore, be superimposed upon our other taxable resources, whose totals are in turn to be diminished by our crusade against intoxicants. How this threatened deficiency is to be supplied, I do not know. Those intent upon the total suppression of the liquor traffic without regard to property rights or to revenue seem to be the least concerned about the problem of increased taxation thus thrust upon our attention. I think that our only resort will be to decrease our estimates by the sum of the amount involved, and in business parlance charge it to profit and loss. If we are to commit the folly of imposing taxes on the one hand and destroying the basis of them on the other, let us not saddle the consequences of our conduct upon the remaining sources of revenue, but accept the dogma of the sincere prohibitionist and shrink from the contamination of a revenue based upon an unholy and a wicked traffic. That is intelligible, although it may not be defensible. But it is worse than hypocrisy to levy a huge tax on distilled liquors on hand, destroy their value by forbidding their sale, and then require all other forms of taxable wealth to supply the deficit. Such a policy indicates the parody on Watts' good old hymn, which informs us that > God moves in a mysterious way

> His blunders to perform.

But, Mr. President, I do not purpose at this time to discuss the details of the pending revenue bill. That I may be required to do when it becomes the unfinished business of the Senate. I am now concerned only with its general features and framework from a constitutional standpoint, and with its structure as a permanent scheme of war revenue. If some of these features are unlawful, unsound, or disproportionate, its legality will be challenged. If the challenge be overcome, its administration may be one-sided and injurious if not impossible. Details at present are, therefore, of secondary importance.

While constitutional questions have during the war become recondite, their intrusion upon novel and comprehensive schemes of legislation can not be prevented. Here they lie upon the very surface of the bill. The House report reveals and briefly disposes of them upon considerations of justice and equity. That is an easy method. If sound, we shall have no difficulty in removing restraints upon our legislative powers. We can relegate the Constitution to the limbo of things that were, and measure our authority by our discretion, should we care to retain that faculty. Personally, I am unable to reconcile my oath of office with this new standard of construction, although in the given instance it negatives the conclusion asserted.

The pending bill is obnoxious to the Constitution in not less than three important particulars. I refer to the proposed taxation of presidential and judicial salaries, of State and municipal securities and salaries, and to the alternative method of assessing and levying taxes by the war-profits method or the excess-profits method, clothing the Government with authority, as stated in the bill, to resort to "whichever of the two methods will yield the higher amount of taxes," and it may be further affirmed that the constitutional principle of uniformity in taxation is seriously jeopardized by the restriction of the taxes last mentioned to corporations only.

1. The Constitution declares that the salary of the President shall not be increased nor diminished during the period for which he has been elected, and that the compensation of judges shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Until now this mandate has been respected. Beginning with 1913 Congress has enacted not less than three income-tax laws under the sixteenth amendment. During the Civil War and again in 1894 similar legislation was written upon the statute books. In none of them did this tax appear. In those of recent date these salaries were expressly excepted. What has occurred to make that now lawful which was unlawful before, or to make that doubtful which until now admitted of no doubt whatever? The need for revenue can not of itself introduce new elements into the problem.

The tax which this bill imposes is direct. It is upon the salary as income, and, as a matter of course, that is diminished to the extent of the tax, which is very high. If we can lawfully exact 10 per cent of these salaries, we may exact 90 per cent of them or take it all.

I do not care to cite copiously from writers of accepted authority that this can not be lawfully done, nor to do more than merely refer to the obvious fact that the integrity of the Executive and the independence of the judiciary demanded the insertion of these restrictions in the organic law of the Nation. Both are at the mercy of the legislature from the hour that the power of taxing these salaries is conceded. And in the case of the judiciary let me emphasize the fact that its representatives must submit to this exaction, however unlawful it may be, since they can only resist by refusing to make payment, by becoming defendants in actions by the Government brought in the courts over which they preside. This would require them to sit in judgment upon themselves, and that is unthinkable. If, then, we impose this tax, we ignore a plain constitutional inhibition, and deprive those concerned of all remedy against the consequences. This violates the very fundamentals of right, of justice, and of morality.

It is to be remembered that these restrictions imposed by the Constitution upon the legislative authority are not merely to safeguard the compensation of the officer. That is but a means to an end, and the end is the independence of the Executive and the judiciary. They are not favored for themselves, but protected for the well being of society by the assurance in the one case of an exact and in the other of a minimum compensation. In No. 73 of the Federalist, in discussing the executive restriction, Mr. Hamilton says:

> It is impossible to imagine any provision which would have been more eligible than this. The legislature on the appointment of a President is once for all to declare what the compensation for his services shall be during the time for which he shall have been elected. This done, they will have no power to alter it either by increase or diminution till a new period of service by a new election commences. They can neither weaken his fortitude by operating upon his necessities, nor corrupt his integrity by appealing to his avarice.

He thus comments in No. 79 upon the judicial restrictions:

> Next to permanency in office, nothing can contribute more to the independence of the judges than a fixed provision for their support. The remark made in relation to the President is equally applicable here. In the general course of human nature, a power over a man's subsistence amounts to a power over his will. And we can never hope to see realized in practice the complete separation of the judicial from the legislative power in any system which leaves the former dependent for pecuniary resource on the occasional grants of the latter.

Mr. Hamilton has thus formulated more clearly and tersely than I can hope to do, the vital necessity of a constant observance of these constitutional safeguards, both of which are assailed by the revenue bill.

2. The bill also includes on gross incomes "the interest from the obligations of States and political subdivisions thereof issued after its passage," together with the compensation of the State and municipal officers. These items have also been excluded either expressly or by judicial decision from previous income-tax legislation. Of the unconstitutionality of this proposed imposition, I entertain no doubt whatever.

The power of the State to tax Federal agencies, and of the Federal Government to tax those of the States was practically settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1819, in the great case of McCulloch against Maryland. A statute of that State imposed a tax upon all banks transacting business within its boundaries not chartered under its laws. A tax under this statute was levied upon the Bank of the United States, operating in Maryland under Federal charter. The tax was resisted by the Government, which challenged the power of the State to levy an impost tax upon its agencies or property. The State denied the right of the Government to create a banking institution, and insisted upon its power as an independent sovereignty to levy and collect the tax.

It was then determined that the power to tax being the power to destroy, could not be exercised by one sovereignty against the property or the agencies of another. The integrity of the general Government as against the States and of the States against the general Government demanded mutual exemption each from the revenue laws of the other. The unanswerable logic of Chief Justice Marshall in the decision of that memorable controversy has remained practically unchallenged until this bill was framed by the House committee; and I venture the prediction that if we incorporate the principle into the law it will be summarily set aside, as it ought to be, by the courts. Otherwise the income of the States and their municipalities, their securities, as well as the interest thereon, may be forced to respond to the demands of the national tax gatherer, 20 per cent, 40, 60, or 80 per cent, as the Congress may determine. And if this be permissible then the reciprocal right of the States to tax the national agencies at once springs into being, and chaos, if not civil strife, may ensue from the conflicting and irreconcilable policies of sovereignties revolving in the same orbit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am deeply interested and very much in sympathy with the argument the Senator is making; but I was a little late in getting into the Chamber, and, if he has not already discussed it, I should like to know whether in his argument the Senator is coming to the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. THOMAS. I have not come to that as yet.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But the Senator will discuss that?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Maryland case was the forerunner of many others of similar import and involving the same contention. Of these, Van Brocklin v. Tennessee (117 U. S.) is a type. It involved the power of Congress to tax State and municipal property. The power was denied, the court declaring that the reasons for exempting such property from Federal taxation were identical with those requiring the exemption of all property and income of the National Government from State taxation.

In Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (158 U. S., 583) the tax assailed was levied, under the act of 1894, directly upon the income from State and municipal bonds in private ownership. It was there held that the want of power to tax State and municipal property extends to incomes derived from dividends or interest upon State and municipal securities.

I may digress by saying that the court was practically unanimous upon that proposition, although widely differing upon other controversies involved in that case.

In his great work on Constitutional Limitations, Judge Cooley (6th ed., pp. 2, 592) thus disposes of the subject:

> If the States can not tax the means by which the National Government performs its functions neither, on the other hand nor for the same reasons, can the latter tax the agencies of the State governments. The same supreme power which established the departments of the General Government determined that the local government should also exist for their own purposes, and made it impossible to protect the people in their common interests without them. Each of these several agencies is confined to its own sphere, and all are strictly subordinate to the Constitution which limits them, and independent of their agencies except as thereby made dependent. There is nothing in the Constitution (of the United States) which can be made to admit of any interference by Congress with the secure existence of any State authority within its lawful bounds. And any such interference by the indirect means of taxation is quite as much beyond the power of the National Legislature as if the interference were direct and extreme. (Citing Fifield v. Close, 15 Mich., 505.)
> It has therefore been held that the law of Congress requiring judicial process to be stamped could not constitutionally be applied to the process of State courts, since otherwise Congress might impose such restrictions upon the State courts as would put an end to their effective action and be equivalent practically to abolishing them altogether. (Citing Warren v. Paul, 22 Ind., 276.) And a similar ruling has been made in other analogous cases.
> Strong as is the language employed to characterize the taxing power in some of the cases which have considered this subject, subsequent events have demonstrated that it was by no means extravagant. An enormous national debt has not only made imposts necessary, which in some cases reach several hundred per cent of the original cost of the articles upon which they are imposed, but the systems of State banking which were in force when the necessity for contracting that debt first arose have been literally taxed out of existence by burdens avowedly imposed for that very purpose. If taxation is thus unlimited in its operation upon the objects within its reach it can not be extravagant to say that the agencies of Government are necessarily excepted from it, since otherwise its exercise might altogether destroy the Government through the destruction of its agencies. That which was predicted as a possible event has been demonstrated by actual facts to be within the compass of its power; and if considerations of policy were important it might be added that if the States possessed the authority to tax the agencies of the National Government they would hold within their hands a constitutional weapon which factions and disappointed parties would be able to wield with terrible effect when the policy of the National Government did not accord with their views; while, on the other hand, if the National Government possessed a corresponding power over the agencies of the State governments there would not be wanting men who in times of strong party excitement would be willing and eager to resort to this power as a means of coercing the States in their legislation upon the subjects remaining under their control.

The principle underlying the opinion in Veasie Bank against Fenno, eighth Wallace, page 533, is in harmony with this view, although apparently opposed to it. The tax of 10 per cent imposed by Congress upon the circulation of State banks, after the issue of Treasury notes and the establishment of national bank system, was there challenged as a violation of the rule. But the court sustained the tax upon the following ground:

> Congress having undertaken, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional power, to provide a currency for the whole country, may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation, and to that end may restrain by suitable enactments the circulation of any notes not issued under its own authority.

It may be added that the vast bulk of the State banks were merely private companies operating under general incorporation laws and in no sense public agencies.

I am, of course, aware that Gov. Hughes, of New York, expressed the apprehension that the sixteenth amendment, if adopted, would confer upon Congress the power to levy the tax I am now assailing. Any expression from the lips of that eminent jurist and statesman should command the most serious consideration. It arrested my attention when made, and I at once examined the subject with some care. I am not aware that Gov. Hughes committed himself upon the subject or that he did more than warn against a possible interpretation of the amendment involving serious consequences to the States by wiping out the salutary principle for which I am contending.

Mr. President, the New York Times of yesterday published an article entitled "Legal Questions in Taxing Bonds," in which reference is made to the message of Gov. Hughes on the 5th day of January, 1910; and I find from a reading of the extracts from Gov. Hughes's message—which are very brief, however—that my impression regarding the character of it is correct. I read:

> When this amendment was submitted for ratification by the Legislature of the State of New York, Charles E. Hughes, who was then governor, sent a message, dated January 5, 1910, in which he called attention to the fact that the phrase "from whatever source derived" might be construed as including the taxation of incomes derived from bonds issued by the State. In his message Gov. Hughes did not say that he believed the courts would place this interpretation upon the constitutional amendment, but merely called the legislature's attention to a possible construction, believing it his duty to place the legislature on guard as to the possible consequences of their action in ratifying the proposed amendment.
> "To place the borrowing capacity of the State and of its governmental agencies at the mercy of the Federal taxing power," said Gov. Hughes, "would be an impairment of the essential rights of the State which, as its officers, we are bound to defend."
> Although for the reason just noted Gov. Hughes advised the legislature not to ratify the amendment, he quoted in his message several Supreme Court opinions indicating that State and municipal bonds could not be taxed by the National Government. He said:
> "While the justices of the court in the Pollock case differed in opinion upon the question whether a tax upon income from property was a direct tax, and as such could not be laid without apportionment, they were unanimous in their conclusion that no Federal tax could be laid upon the income from municipal bonds. Mr. Justice White, who dissented in the Pollock case with regard to other questions, as to this said (157 U. S., 652):
> "'The authorities cited in the opinion are decisive of this question. They are relevant to one case and not to the other, because in the one case there is full power in the Federal Government to tax, the only controversy being whether the tax imposed is direct or indirect, while in the other there is no power whatever in the Federal Government, and therefore the levy, whether direct or indirect, is beyond the taxing power.'"

Without present regard to that, I then reached the conclusion that the amendment was merely designed to supply the authority to levy an income tax which the Supreme Court denied to Congress in the case of Pollock against Farmers' Loan Co. by substituting the amendment for division 4 of section 9, Article I, of the Constitution, which declares that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." It contained no new grant of power and therefore included no new objects of taxation. The method of laying the tax was changed, but the subject of it remained the same.

This view was so exhaustively considered and so conclusively demonstrated by Senator Root in his celebrated letter to State Senator Davenport, of New York, in 1910, prompted by the message of Gov. Hughes, that I shall ask the privilege of printing it at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1910.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since our conversation last month I have given much consideration to the scope and effect of the proposed income-tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Much as I respect the opinion of the governor of the State, I can not agree with the view expressed in his special message of January 5, and as I advocated in the Senate the resolution to submit the proposed amendment, it seems appropriate that I should state my view of its effect.

The proposed amendment is in these words:

"ART. 16. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration."

The objection made to the amendment is that this will confer upon the National Government the power to tax incomes derived from bonds issued by the States or under the authority of the States, and will place the borrowing capacity of the State and its governmental agencies at the mercy of the Federal taxing power.

I do not find in the amendment any such meaning or effect. I do not consider that the amendment in any degree whatever will enlarge the taxing power of the National Government or will have any effect except to relieve the exercise of that taxing power from the requirement that the tax shall be apportioned among the several States. The effect of the amendment will be, in my view, the same as if it said, "The United States may lay a tax on incomes without apportioning the tax, and this shall be applicable whatever the source of the income subjected to the tax," leaving the question, "What incomes are subject to national taxation?" to be determined by the same principles and rules which are now applicable to the determination of that question.

If we were to construe the proposed amendment only by a critical examination of its words, the view upon which the objection is based would be reached by practically cutting the provision in two and reading it as if it read, "the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived," without the concluding words. But we are not at liberty to do this. The amendment consists of a single sentence and the whole of it must be read together. It expresses but a single idea, and that is that the tax to which it relates must be laid and collected without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration, while the words "from whatever source derived" are obviously introduced to make the exemption from the rule of apportionment comprehensive and applicable to all taxes on incomes.

We are not left, however, to a mere critical examination of words. This provision, as Mr. Justice Bradley said of the Constitution in the Legal tender cases, is "to be interpreted in the light of history and of the circumstances of the period in which it was framed." Justice Story said of another clause of the Constitution, in Brisco v. The Bank of Kentucky (2 Peters, 332).

"And I mean to insist that the history of the Colonies before and during the Revolution and down to the very time of the adoption of the Constitution constitutes the highest and most authentic evidence to which we can resort to interpret this clause of the instrument, and to disregard it would be to blind ourselves to the practical mischiefs which it was meant to suppress and to forget all the great purposes to which it was to be applied."

This view must necessarily be applied to the proposed amendment if it be adopted. It will be construed in the light of the judicial and political history which led to the proposal and which appears upon the public records of our Government.

What is that history? The Constitution of 1787 conferred upon the National Government the power of taxation without any limit whatever, except that taxes on exports were prohibited.

The method of exercising the power, however, was subjected to two limitations. One, that imports, duties, and excises should be uniform, and the other that direct taxes should be apportioned among the States. The apportionment provisions were as follows:

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC. 2. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers," etc. (Amended, but not in this respect, by the fourteenth amendment.)

"SEC. 9. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration before directed to be taken."

For more than a hundred years after the adoption of the Constitution various tax laws of Congress were from time to time brought before the courts upon objections that they imposed direct taxes in violation of the rule of apportionment. The decisions of the courts uniformly sustained these laws, from the Hylton case, in 1796, which sustained an unapportioned tax on carriages (3 Dallas, 171), to the Springer case, in 1880, which sustained an unapportioned tax on incomes. (102 U. S., 586.)

In the meantime numerous laws were passed and enforced imposing taxes on incomes without apportionment, and a great part of the means for carrying on the Civil War was derived from such taxes.

In the year 1895, however, an income-tax law included in the Wilson tariff act of 1894 was brought before the Supreme Court in the case of Pollock against the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., and in that case the court decided against the law. The case was heard twice. On the first hearing a majority of the court held that a tax on income derived from real estate must be apportioned as a direct tax, because a tax on real estate itself would be direct, and the judges divided equally as to whether a tax on income derived from personal property must be apportioned. (157 U. S., 429.)

Upon the second hearing of the case the court, by a majority of five to four, held that a tax upon income derived from personal property must be considered a direct tax and must be apportioned (158 U. S., 601). All the judges agreed, however, that taxes on incomes derived from business or occupations need not be apportioned. The effect of these decisions was thus described in one of the minority opinions:

"But the serious aspect of the present decision is that by a new interpretation of the Constitution it so ties the hands of the legislative branch of the Government that without an amendment of that instrument, or unless this court at some future time should return to the old theory of the Constitution, Congress can not subject to taxation—however great the needs or pressing the necessities of the Government—either the invested personal property of the country, bonds, stocks, and investments of all kinds, or the income arising from the renting of real estate or from the yield of personal property, except by the grossly unequal and unjust rule of apportionment among the States. Thus, undue and disproportioned burdens are placed upon the many, while the few, safely intrenched behind the rule of apportionment among the States on the basis of numbers, are permitted to evade their share of responsibility for the support of the Government ordained for the protection of the rights of all."

It was so evidently impossible to collect an income tax by apportionment among the States according to population that the general judgment of the country confirmed the opinion that the decision in the Pollock case had practically taken away from the Congress a power of vital importance to the General Government—a power the exercise of which had, at least in one time of peril, proved essential to the Nation's life.

The attention of the country was sharply called to the need of more Government revenue for the first time after the Pollock case by the decrease of customs and internal revenue receipts and the rapidly mounting deficit which followed the financial panic of 1907; and in the extraordinary session of Congress which began March 15, 1909, when the revised tariff bill came into the Senate, an amendment to the bill was introduced reproducing in substance the old income-tax provisions of 1894 which the Supreme Court had held to be invalid both as to income derived from real estate and as to income derived from personal property. The avowed and necessary effect of including such provisions in the new tariff law would be to present again to the Supreme Court the same questions which had been decided in the Pollock case and to challenge a reversal of their decision. Thereupon the resolution for the submission of this amendment was introduced in the Senate and was passed by Congress.

The proposal followed the suggestions of the Supreme Court in the Pollock case.

The evil to be remedied was avowedly and manifestly the incapacity of the National Government resulting from the decision that income practically could not be taxed when derived either from real estate or from personal property, although it could be taxed when derived from business or occupation.

The terms of the amendment are apt to cure that evil and to take away from the different classes of income considered by the court a practical immunity from taxation based upon the source from which they were derived.

There was no question in Congress or in the courts or in the country about the taxation of State securities. No one claimed that the inability of the General Government to tax them was an evil. The inability to tax them did not arise from the terms of the Constitution, but from the fact that, being the necessary instruments of carrying on other and sovereign governments, they were not the proper subject of national taxation, and that, therefore, no provisions of the Constitution, however wide the scope of their language, could be held to apply to such securities or to the income from them. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, says:

"The power to tax, whether by the United States or by the States, is to be construed in the light of, and limited by, the fact that the States and the Union are inseparable, and that the Constitution contemplates the perpetual maintenance of each with all its constitutional powers, unembarrassed and unimpaired by any action of the other. The taxing power of the Federal Government does not therefore extend to the means or agencies through or by the employment of which the States perform their essential functions, etc."

This rule of construction has been maintained for generations. It is undisputed; it was referred to with approval by the justices who wrote and delivered the opinions in the Pollock case both for and against the judgment. It has been declared again and again by the Supreme Court to be not open to question. It is a rule of construction just as controlling in defining the scope of the proposed amendment as it is in defining the scope of the existing provisions. Under it, from the earliest times of our Government, the apparently unlimited taxing power conferred by the terms of the Constitution has been held not to apply to the instrumentalities of the State. Under it acts of Congress which by their express terms appeared to include instrumentalities of State government have uniformly been held not to include them; this uniform, long-established, and indisputable rule applied to the construction of our Constitution—a rule which has been declared to be essential to a continuance of our dual system of government—forbids that the words of that instrument conferring the power of taxation shall be deemed to apply to anything but the proper subjects of national taxation. Under it we are forbidden to apply the words "from whatever source derived" in the proposed amendment to any of the instrumentalities of State government.

This amendment will be no new grant of power. The Congress already has power to impose taxes on incomes from whatever source derived, subject to the rule of construction which excludes State securities from the operation of the power, but the taxes so imposed must be apportioned among the States. Under the proposed amendment there will be the same and no greater power to tax incomes, from whatever source derived, subject to the same rule of construction, but relieved from the requirement that the tax shall be apportioned.

It appears, therefore, that no danger to the powers or instrumentalities of the States is to be apprehended from the adoption of the amendment.

It would be cause for regret if the amendment were rejected by the Legislature of New York.

It is said that a very large part of any income tax under the amendment would be paid by citizens of New York. That is undoubtedly true, but there is all the more reason why our legislature should take special care to exclude every narrow and selfish motive from influence upon its action and should consider the proposal in a spirit of broad national patriotism and should act upon it for the best interests of the whole country.

The main reason why the citizens of New York will pay so large a part of the tax is that New York City is the chief financial and commercial center of a great country, with vast resources and industrial activity. For many years Americans engaged in developing the wealth of all parts of the country have been going to New York to secure capital and market their securities and to buy their supplies. Thousands of men who have amassed fortunes in all sorts of enterprises in other States have gone to New York to live, because they like the life of the city or because their distant enterprises require representation at the financial center. The incomes of New York are in a great measure derived from the country at large. A continual stream of wealth sets toward the great city from the mines and manufactories and railroads outside of New York. The United States is no longer a mere group of separate communities embraced in a political union; it has become a product of organic growth, a vast industrial organization covering and including the whole country; and the relation of New York City to the whole organization of which it is a part is the great source of her wealth and the chief reason why her citizens will pay so great a part of an income tax. We have the wealth because behind the city stands the country. We ought to be willing to share the burdens of the National Government in the same proportion in which we share its benefits.

The circumstances that originally justified the establishment of the rule of apportionment in the Constitution have long since passed away. It is universally conceded that its application to existing conditions would be so unjust and inequitable as to be impossible. The power of taxation which the rule makes it impossible for the Nation to exercise may be again, as it has once been, vital to the preservation of national existence. It would be most unfortunate if the several States of the Union were to insist upon the continuance of this unjust and useless limitation upon the necessary powers originally and wisely granted to the National Government.

With kind regards, I am always

Faithfully, yours, ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT,
Senate Chamber, Albany, N. Y.

Mr. THOMAS. Upon the strength and under the interpretation outlined in this letter, the General Assemblies of the States of New York and New Jersey finally ratified the amendment. I think I am safe in asserting that such was the understanding of the legislatures of the other ratifying States. I affirm that it could not have been ratified at all had it been supposed to clothe the Federal Government with power to impair the integrity and undermine the structure of the States through the power of unlimited taxation. Nothing in the debates of the Congress nor in the comments of the press during the period of its consideration—nothing, indeed, until the message of Gov. Hughes appeared—was said or written which intimated that the representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States were subjecting their States, the agencies and instrumentalities thereof, to the taxing power of the Nation. The financial exigencies of the Government, however great, can not limit or enlarge the purport or the phraseology of the organic law.

The apprehension of Gov. Hughes arose from the phrase, "from whatever source derived." If he were correct, the income from Government bonds then existing and made free from taxation by the law authorizing their issue would be subject to the tax. Surely the Congress never designed by constitutional amendment or otherwise to violate its own contracts with the holders of the national securities, or that the courts would sanction its action if so intended.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States has had occasion to consider the extent to which the taxing power of the United States has been enlarged by the fifteenth amendment, and its conclusion is that the amendment has merely changed the method without adding to the extent to which assets were subject to Federal taxation.

In the case of Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (240 U. S., p. 1) the subject is fully considered, from pages 9 to 19, inclusive, which I ask the privilege of incorporating in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

As a stockholder of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. the appellant filed his bill to enjoin the corporation from complying with the income-tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (sec. II, ch. 16, 38 Stat., 166). Because of constitutional questions duly arising the case is here on direct appeal from a decree sustaining a motion to dismiss because no ground for relief was stated.

The right to prevent the corporation from returning and paying the tax was based upon many averments as to the repugnancy of the statute to the Constitution of the United States, of the peculiar relation of the corporation to the stockholders and their particular interests resulting from many of the administrative provisions of the assailed act, of the confusion, wrong, and multiplicity of suits and and the absence of all means of redress which would result if the corporation paid the tax and complied with the act in other respects without protest, as it was alleged it was its intention to do. To put out of the way a question of jurisdiction, we at once say that in view of these averments and the ruling in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429) sustaining the right of a stockholder to sue to restrain a corporation under proper averments from voluntarily paying a tax charged to be unconstitutional on the ground that to permit such a suit did not violate the prohibitions of section 3224, Revised Statutes, against enjoining the enforcement of taxes, we are of opinion that the contention here made that there was no jurisdiction of the cause, since to entertain it would violate the provisions of the Revised Statutes referred to, is without merit. Before coming to dispose of the case on the merits, however, we observe that the defendant corporation having called the attention of the Government to the pendency of the cause and the nature of the controversy and its unwillingness to voluntarily refuse to comply with the act assailed the United States as amicus curiæ has at bar been heard both orally and by brief for the purpose of sustaining the decree.

Aside from averments as to citizenship and residence, recitals as to the provisions of the statute and statements as to the business of the corporation contained in the first 10 paragraphs of the bill advanced to sustain jurisdiction, the bill alleged 21 constitutional objections specified in that number of paragraphs or subdivisions. As all the grounds assert a violation of the Constitution, it follows that in a wide sense they all charge a repugnancy of the statute to the sixteenth amendment, under the more immediate sanction of which the statute was adopted.

The various propositions are so intermingled as to cause it to be difficult to classify them. We are of opinion, however, that the confusion is not inherent, but rather arises from the conclusion that the sixteenth amendment provides for a hitherto unknown power of taxation; that is, a power to levy an income tax which, although direct, should not be subject to the regulation of apportionment applicable to all other direct taxes. And the far-reaching effect of this erroneous assumption will be made clear by generalizing the many contentions advanced in argument to support it, as follows: (a) The amendment authorizes only a particular character of direct tax without apportionment, and therefore if a tax is levied under its assumed authority which does not partake of the characteristics exacted by the amendment it is outside of the amendment and is void as a direct tax in the general constitutional sense because not apportioned. (b) As the amendment authorizes a tax only upon incomes "from whatever source derived," the exclusion from taxation of some income of designated persons and classes is not authorized, and hence the constitutionality of the law must be tested by the general provisions of the Constitution as to taxation, and thus again the tax is void for want of apportionment. (c) As the right to tax "incomes from whatever source derived" for which the amendment provides must be considered as exacting intrinsic uniformity, therefore no tax comes under the authority of the amendment not conforming to such standard, and hence all the provisions of the assailed statute must once more be tested solely under the general and preexisting provisions of the Constitution, causing the statute again to be void in the absence of apportionment. (d) As the power conferred by the amendment is new and prospective, the attempt in the statute to make its provisions retroactively apply is void, because, so far as the retroactive period is concerned, it is governed by the preexisting constitutional requirements as to apportionment.

But it clearly results that the proposition and the contentions under it, if acceded to, would cause one provision of the Constitution to destroy another; that is, they would result in bringing the provisions of the amendment exempting a direct tax from apportionment into irreconcilable conflict with the general requirement that all direct taxes be apportioned. Moreover, the tax authorized by the amendment, being direct, would not come under the rule of uniformity applicable under the Constitution to other than direct taxes, and thus it would come to pass that the result of the amendment would be to authorize a paricular direct tax not subject either to apportionment or to the rule of geographical uniformity, thus giving power to impose a different tax in one State or States than was levied in another State or States. This result instead of simplifying the situation and making clear the limitations on the taxing power, which obviously the amendment must have been intended to accomplish, would create radical and destructive changes in our constitutional system and multiply confusion.

But let us by a demonstration of the error of the fundamental proposition as to the significance of the amendment dispel the confusion necessarily arising from the argument deduced from it. Before coming, however, to the text of the amendment, to the end that its significance may be determined in the light of the previous legislative and judicial history of the subject with which the amendment is concerned and with a knowledge of the conditions which presumptively led up to its adoption, and hence of the purpose it was intended to accomplish, we make a brief statement on those subjects.

That the authority conferred upon Congress by section 8 of Article I "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" is exhaustive and embraces every conceivable power of taxation has never been questioned, or, if it has, has been so often authoritatively declared as to render it necessary only to state the doctrine. And it has also never been questioned from the foundation, without stopping presently to determine under which of the separate headings the power was properly to be classed, that there was authority given, as the part was included in the whole, to lay and collect income taxes. Again, it has never, moreover, been questioned that the conceded complete and all-embracing taxing power was subject, so far as they were respectively applicable, to limitations resulting from the requirements of Article I, section 8, clause 1, that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," and to the limitations of Article I, section 2, clause 3, that "direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States," and of Article I, section 9, clause 4, that "no capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." In fact, the two great subdivisions embracing the complete and perfect delegation of the power to tax and the two correlated limitations as to such power were thus aptly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., supra, at page 557: "In the matter of taxation, the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely: The rule of apportionment as to direct taxes, and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises." It is to be observed, however, as long ago pointed out in Veazie Bank v. Fenno, (8 Wall., 533, 541), that the requirement of apportionment as to one of the great classes and of uniformity as to the other class were not so much a limitation upon the complete and all-embracing authority to tax, but in their essence were simply regulations concerning the mode in which the plenary power was to be exerted. In the whole history of the Government down to the time of the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, leaving aside some conjectures expressed of the possibility of a tax lying intermediate between the two great classes and embraced by neither, no question has been anywhere made as to the correctness of these propositions. At the very beginning, however, there arose differences of opinion concerning the criteria to be applied in determining in which of the two great subdivisions a tax would fall. Without pausing to state at length the basis of these differences and the consequences which arose from them, as the whole subject was elaborately reviewed in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601), we make a condensed statement which is, in substance, taken from what was said in that case. Early the differences were manifested in pressing on the one hand and opposing on the other the passage of an act levying a tax without apportionment on carriages "for the conveyance of persons," and when such a tax was enacted the question of its repugnancy to the Constitution soon came to this court for determination. (Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall., 171.) It was held that the tax came within the class of excises, duties, and imposts, and therefore did not require apportionment; and while this conclusion was agreed to by all the members of the court who took part in the decision of the case, there was not an exact coincidence in the reasoning by which the conclusion was sustained. Without stating the minor differences, it may be said with substantial accuracy that the divergent reasoning was this: On the one hand, that the tax was not in the class of direct taxes requiring apportion, because it was not levied directly on property because of its ownership but rather on its use, and was therefore an excise, duty, or impost; and on the other, that in any event the class of direct taxes included only taxes directly levied on real estate because of its ownership. Putting out of view the difference of reasoning which led to the concurrent conclusion in the Hylton case, it is undoubted that it came to pass in legislative practice that the line of demarcation between the two great classes of direct taxes on the one hand and excises, duties, and imposts on the other, which was exemplified by the ruling in that case, was accepted and acted upon. In the first place, this is shown by the fact that wherever (and there were a number of cases of that kind) a tax was levied directly on real estate or slaves because of ownership it was treated as coming within the direct class and apportionment was provided for, while no instance of apportionment as to any other kind of tax is afforded. Again, the situation is aptly illustrated by the various acts taxing incomes derived from property of every kind and nature which were enacted, beginning in 1861 and lasting during what may be termed the Civil War period. It is not disputable that these latter taxing laws were classed under the head of excises, duties, and imposts, because it was assumed that they were of that character inasmuch as although putting a tax burden on income of every kind, including that derived from property real or personal, they were not taxes directly on property because of its ownership. And this practical construction came in theory to be the accepted one since it was adopted without dissent by the most eminent of the text writers. (1 Kent Com., 254, 256; 1 Story Const., sec. 955; Cooley Const. Lim., 5th ed., *48; Miller on the Constitution, 237; Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, sec. 281; Hare Const. Law, vol. 1, 249, 250; Burroughs on Taxation, 502; Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, 225.)

Upon the lapsing of a considerable period after the repeal of the income-tax laws referred to, in 1894 an act was passed laying a tax on incomes from all classes of property and other sources of revenue which was not apportioned, and which therefore was of course assumed to come within the classification of excises, duties, and imposts, which were subject to the rule of uniformity but not to the rule of apportionment. The constitutional validity of this law was challenged on the ground that it did not fall within the class of excises, duties, and imposts but was direct, in the constitutional sense, and was therefore void for want of apportionment; and that question came to this court and was passed upon in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601). The court, fully recognizing in the passage which we have previously quoted the all-embracing character of the two great classifications including, on the one hand, direct taxes subject to apportionment, and, on the other, excises, duties, and imposts subject to uniformity, held the law to be unconstitutional in substance for these reasons: Concluding that the classification of direct was adopted for the purpose of rendering it impossible to burden by taxation accumulations of property, real or personal, except subject to the regulation of apportionment, it was held that the duty existed to fix what was a direct tax in the constitutional sense so as to accomplish this purpose contemplated by the Constitution (157 U. S., 581). Coming to consider the validity of the tax from this point of view, while not questioning at all that in common understanding it was direct merely on income and only indirect on property, it was held that, considering the substance of things, it was direct on property in a constitutional sense, since to burden an income by a tax was, from the point of substance, to burden the property from which the income was derived, and thus accomplish the very thing which the provision as to apportionment of direct taxes was adopted to prevent. As this conclusion but enforced a regulation as to the mode of exercising power under particular circumstances, it did not in any way dispute the all-embracing taxing authority possessed by Congress, including necessarily therein the power to impose income taxes, if only they conformed to the constitutional regulations which were applicable to them. Moreover, in addition, the conclusion reached in the Pollock case did not in any degree involve holding that income taxes generically and necessarily came within the class of direct taxes on property, but, on the contrary, recognized the fact that taxation on income was in its nature an excise entitled to be enforced as such unless and until it was concluded that to enforce it would amount to accomplishing the result which the requirement as to apportionment of direct taxation was adopted to prevent, in which case the duty would arise to disregard form and consider substance alone, and hence subject the tax to the regulation as to apportionment which otherwise as an excise would not apply to it. Nothing could serve to make this clearer than to recall that in the Pollock case, in so far as the law taxed incomes from other classes of property than real estate and invested personal property—that is, income from "professions, trades, employments, or vocations" (158 U. S., 637)—its validity was recognized; indeed it was expressly declared that no dispute was made upon that subject, and attention was called to the fact that taxes on such income had been sustained as excise taxes in the past (Id., p. 635). The whole law was, however, declared unconstitutional on the ground that to permit it to thus operate would relieve real estate and invested personal property from taxation and "would leave the burden of the tax to be borne by professions, trades, employments, or vocations; and in that way what was intended as a tax on capital would remain, in substance, a tax on occupations and labor" (Id., p. 637), a result which, it was held, could not have been contemplated by Congress.

This is the text of the amendment:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

It is clear on the face of this text that it does not purport to confer power to levy income taxes in a generic sense—an authority already possessed and never questioned—or to limit and distinguish between one kind of income taxes and another, but that the whole purpose of the amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived. Indeed, in the light of the history which we have given and of the decision in the Pollock case, and the ground upon which the ruling in that case was based, there is no escape from the conclusion that the amendment was drawn for the purpose of doing away for the future with the principle upon which the Pollock case was decided—that is, of determining whether a tax on income was direct, not by a consideration of the burden placed on the taxed income upon which it directly operated, but by taking into view the burden which resulted on the property from which the income was derived, since in express terms the amendment provides that income taxes, from whatever source the income may be derived, shall not be subject to the regulation of apportionment. From this, in substance, it indisputably arises, first, that all the contentions which we have previously noticed concerning the assumed limitations to be implied from the language of the amendment as to the nature and character of the income taxes which it authorizes find no support in the text and are in irreconcilable conflict with the very purpose which the amendment was adopted to accomplish. Second, that the contention that the amendment treats a tax on income as a direct tax, although it is relieved from apportionment and is necessarily therefore not subject to the rule of uniformity, as such rule only applies to taxes which are not direct, thus destroying the two great classifications which have been recognized and enforced from the beginning, is also wholly without foundation, since the command of the amendment that all income taxes shall not be subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the taxed income may be derived, forbids the application to such taxes of the rule applied in the Pollock case, by which alone such taxes were removed from the great class of excises, duties, and imposts subject to the rule of uniformity and were placed under the other or direct class. This must be unless it can be said that, although the Constitution as a result of the amendment in express terms excludes the criterion of source of income, that criterion yet remains for the purpose of destroying the classifications of the Constitution by taking an excise out of the class to which it belongs and transferring it to a class in which it can not be placed consistently with the requirements of the Constitution. Indeed, from another point of view, the amendment demonstrates that no such purpose was intended and, on the contrary, shows that it was drawn with the object of maintaining the limitations of the Constitution and harmonizing their operation. We say this because it is to be observed that although from the date of the Hylton case because of statements made in the opinions in that case it had come to be accepted that direct taxes in the constitutional sense were confined to taxes levied directly on real estate because of its ownership, the amendment contains nothing repudiating or challenging the ruling in the Pollock case that the word "direct" had a broader significance since it embraced also taxes levied directly on personal property because of its ownership, and therefore the amendment at least impliedly makes such wider significance a part of the Constitution—a condition which clearly demonstrates that the purpose was not to change the existing interpretation, except to the extent necessary to accomplish the result intended; that is, the prevention of the resort to the sources from which a taxed income was derived in order to cause a direct tax on the income to be a direct tax on the source itself, and thereby to take an income tax out of the class of excises, duties, and imposts and place it in the class of direct taxes.

Mr. THOMAS. In the case of Stanton against Baltic Mining Co., in the same volume, at page 103, the court, on page 112, reiterates this doctrine, referring back to the Brushaber case as containing at length the reasons for the conclusion.

Mr. President, the language of the Brushaber case may be said to be somewhat involved; but still more recently, in an unreported case—the case of Peck & Co. against Lowe, decided on the 20th of May last, and in which the construction of the fifteenth amendment was involved—the court says:

> The sixteenth amendment, although referred to in argument, has no real bearing and may be put out of view. As pointed out in recent decisions, it does not extend the taxing power to new or excepted subjects, but merely removes all occasion, which otherwise might exist, for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income, whether it be derived from one source or another.

So, Mr. President, the opinion of former Senator Root, which I have already embodied in the RECORD, and upon the strength of which two States, at least, ratified the fifteenth amendment, finds official justification in the last utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject; and inasmuch as that pronouncement preceded the formation of this bill, I am at a loss to understand why these taxes should have been included within its provisions.

The restrictions of the Constitution regarding the compensation of the Executive and judiciary, although not extended in terms to State officers of similar character, are founded upon reasons which make them apply with equal force to the compensation of all State and municipal officers when considered as subjects of Federal taxation. And the reasons advanced by the courts for the exemption of incomes and property of the States and their subdivisions, and of the securities belonging to individuals, also shield the salaries of State officials from the Federal taxgatherer. Whenever these items of property and income become subject to national assessments the States are themselves subject to progressive but certain extinction. For political considerations always potent in molding Federal revenue bills will here find a new field of activity, and State officials and policy will be directed by national authority into channels of its own choosing.

The clause of the sixteenth amendment subjecting incomes to taxation "from whatever source derived," is not broader than the power given by clause 1, section 8, "to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises, but all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States." The limitations regarding capitation, or other direct taxes, and taxes on exports do not affect excises, which is but another name for internal-revenue taxation. The power to lay these is unconditional save as to uniformity; yet stamp or other taxes on judicial process and provisions that documents required to be stamped shall not be received in evidence in any court unless so stamped, can not be applied to the process of State courts or enforced against litigants in such courts. An unbroken line of precedents has so determined. One sovereignty can not invade another through the subtle process of taxation until the courts reverse the decisions of a century or until the people by constitutional amendment shall clothe the Congress with the power to do so in direct and unmistakable fashion. From an abundance of material I select the cases of Carpenter against Snelling, Ninety-seventh Massachusetts, page 452; Craig against Dimock, Forty-seventh Illinois, page 358; Moore against Moore, Forty-seventh New York, page 467; and Syales against Davis,, Twenty-second Wisconsin, page 225; while Collector against Day, Eleventh Wallace, page 113, expressly declares that the salary of a State officer is not subject to a Federal tax.

I cite a number of authorities in connection with that statement, which it is not necessary to read, but I want to refer particularly to the case of the Collector against Day, Eleventh Wallace, 113, which expressly declares that the salary of a State officer is not subject to a Federal tax. Inasmuch as the Supreme Court has held that there is no enlargement of the taxing power, but merely a change of its methods, as a result of the sixteenth amendment, this case is quite as applicable to-day as it was under the law under which the tax was assessed. The assessment was made under the income-tax law enacted by Congress during the war, which in terms subjected all incomes to taxation, and under the general power there apparently given by legislation this tax was levied upon the salary of a judicial officer of the State of New York who resisted the payment of it. The entire opinion is replete with information and I might appropriately read it all, but I shall content myself with reading from page 125 and following. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson:

Two of the great departments of the Government, the executive and legislative, depend upon the exercise of the powers or upon the people of the States. The Constitution guarantees to the States a republican form of government and protects each against invasion or domestic violence. Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable that without them the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated, by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. And, more especially, those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights, one of which is the establishment of the judicial department and the appointment of officers to administer their laws. Without this power and the exercise of it we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence. A despotic government might. We have said that one of the reserved powers was that to establish a judicial department; it would have been more accurate, and in accordance with the existing state of things at the time, to have said the power to maintain a judicial department. All of the 13 States were in the possession of this power and had exercised it at the adoption of the Constitution, and it is not pretended that any grant of it to the General Government is found in that instrument. It is, therefore, one of the sovereign powers vested in the States by their constitutions, which remained unaltered and unimpaired, and in respect to which the State is as independent of the General Government as that Government is independent of the States.

The supremacy of the General Government, therefore, so much relied on in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error in respect to the question before us, can not be maintained. The two Governments are upon an equality, and the question is whether the power "to lay and collect taxes" enables the General Government to tax the salary of a judicial officer of the State, which officer is a means or instrumentality employed to carry into execution one of its most important functions, the administration of the laws, and which concerns the exercise of a right reserved to the States.

We do not say the mere circumstance of the establishment of the judicial department and the appointment of officers to administer the laws, being among the reserved powers of the State, disables the General Government from levying the tax, as that depends upon the express power to "lay and collect taxes," but it shows that it is an original inherent power never parted with and in respect to which the supremacy of that Government does not exist and is of no importance in determining the question; and, further, that being an original and reserved power, and the judicial officers appointed under it being a means or instrumentality employed to carry it into effect, the right and necessity of its unimpaired exercise and the exemption of the officer from taxation by the General Government stand upon as solid a ground and are maintained by principles and reasons as cogent as those which led to the exemption of the Federal officer in Dobbins against The Commissioners of Erie from taxation by the State, for, in this respect—that is, in respect to the reserved powers—the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government. And if the means and instrumentalities employed by that Government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are necessarily and for the sake of self-preservation exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserved powers for like reasons equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are these means if another power may tax them at discretion?

A unique feature of the pending bill is the proposed alternate or double system which it proposes for the taxation of profits as such. One of these systems is christened the war-profits tax, the other the excess-profits tax. These are intended to operate upon corporations only, and the authorities are required to use "whichever of the methods yields the higher tax in the case of such corporation." The war-profits method imposes a tax of 80 per cent upon all profits equal to the average net income of the corporation over its average income in the statutory prewar period, less a specific deduction of $3,000. If the corporation did not exist during the whole prewar period or had no income then or was less than 10 per cent of its invested capital, its war profit is the surplus over 10 per cent of its invested capital for the taxable year, plus the sum of $3,000.

The excess-profits method consists of a graded tax ranging from 35 to 70 per cent of the net profit in excess of exemption of $3,000, plus 8 per cent of the invested capital for the taxable year. The ingenuity of the tax gatherer is to determine which of these probes shall be used in each individual instance. Whichever will realize the larger amount of the tax must be chosen. Possibly if bad judgment is disclosed in the selection, as revealed in results, the method chosen will be shifted to the one rejected, since otherwise the terms of the law would not be complied with.

This novel device violates the familiar requirements of certainty and uniformity in taxation; requirements which are inseparable from justice and equity. Its only merit is its novelty. It may have disfigured other systems of taxation, but not I think in any English-speaking country. I have been unable to discover any authority disclosing its existence elsewhere or in previous national legislation, although I have not had the time for an exhaustive research. That fact is the best of reasons for believing it to be unconstitutional; for if it had appeared heretofore its validity would undoubtedly have been successfully challenged.

Mr. President, if Congress can provide two radically different bases for levying a tax against the same individual upon the same taxable asset and direct the administration of the law to resort to that which in the individual instance will realize the most revenue, it may provide three, four, or half a dozen of them. Any argument supporting the one will surely sustain the other. The taxpayer must submit to the experimental test of each method, that the collector may judge which of them will prove the most efficient. What he must pay he can never know with certainty. And the method applied to him for one taxable year may be discarded and another selected for the next.

Such a system would inevitably strew inequalities all over the country, and drive the taxpayer to the alternative of juggling his affairs in the hope of escaping confiscation by forms of law. It would thus offer a premium to rascality, and furnish ample justification for perjury. It would make taxes both unequal and uncertain in their distribution, in cheerful disregard of the constitutional requirement of uniformity. That quality can not rest upon a shifting and changeable method either of assessment or levy. It may exploit the taxpayer, but it can not square with justice, and should not disfigure the statute books. Finally it would arm the collector with a weapon through whose exercise favoritism, fraud, and bribery would flourish in unscrupulous hands and beset the administration of the national revenues with opportunities for corruption against whose temptations the virtues of the average official would not long resist.

Let me conclude by emphasizing another conspicuous defect in this bill. I refer to the confinement of this alternative tax to bodies corporate. Doubtless Congress has the power to do this, but only at the sacrifice of elementary principles of fairness and equity. The only reason alleged for doing so is "the difficulty in administering an excess-profits tax applicable to individuals." Shall we then refrain from requiring individuals and partnerships to pay this extra tax, because it is not as easy to make them pay it as it is to make corporations do so? Shall we forego an extensive source of revenue when all we can raise is urgently needed because we may encounter difficulty in collecting it? If so, why tax individuals at all? If the fact be so it confronts us as well in administering the income tax. We discriminate between different individuals elsewhere, but we do not discriminate between the individual and the corporation in the other schedules; why should we do so in this? I am compelled to believe that it is due to other causes.

The individual votes; the corporation does not; and votes must not be distracted unless unavoidable. All tax laws are unpopular. Why make them any more so than is absolutely necessary? Appropriations are popular and eagerly solicited. Why restrict them at all? Our revenue legislation is framed therefore to embrace as few people as possible and unusual exactions we reserve exclusively for those artificial creations which possess many privileges, but which are comparatively few in number.

The profiteer is an unavoidable evil in times of war. Public imagination pictures him as a very plethoric person, in Prince Albert coat, a high hat, and ornamented with a double chin, operating through corporate agencies and gorged with ill-gotten spoil. Such some of him may be. But the genus has other forms and operates in divers ways.

The corporation which takes advantage of the national needs and profits unduly is a profiteer.

So is the individual manufacturer, contractor, or material man.

So are the workman, farmer, and the miner when engaged in the same practices. The difference is purely one of degree, and all of them should be subject to the same law of taxation. Yet all save the first are immune from the war profits and excess profits schedules of this bill. This is an outrage.

Every man holding up the Government, capitalist, merchant, manufacturer, miner, laborer, or farmer should in these times pay the Government "through the nose." Nothing will prevent it save our fear of their political vengeance.

In legislation of this sort we are political cowards. We are brave enough when passing appropriations for pensions and prairie dogs, for dry docks in dry harbors, and for artesian wells to moisten navigable streams, but fainthearted when seeking means to make our appropriations good. We need many things in these days of stress and trial, but nothing more urgently than the good old virtue of moral courage, courage to legislate for the country's needs without fear, without favor, without regard to personal consequences. I devoutly hope that stimulated by such a sentiment we may consider, amend, and finally enact a revenue bill uniform in character, simple in administration, embracing pursuits and property within the scope of national taxation, excluding those which outlie that province and enacted without regard to political considerations or political consequences.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky in the chair.) The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to take it up where it was last left off?

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. I was not here on Saturday and I do not know whether the Senate disposed of the water-power bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. No, sir; it has not been disposed of.

Mr. FLETCHER rose.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not better to go on with it?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Florida has risen to ask that the unfinished business be placed before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware of that. The Chair stated that the calendar under Rule VIII would be proceeded with, and I thought possibly it would be better to complete that measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it has been so long since anything was said upon the pending motion, although the subject has occupied the time of the Senate, that I desire to call attention to some of the difficulties in the way of considering the bill in conference in its present stage.

The Senate passed a bill providing for permits to be issued under certain conditions for the erection of dams and other structures in navigable streams. It limited the application of the bill to certain navigable waters. The House instead of dealing with the bill as it passed the Senate raised a special committee, consisting of three or four members of various committees of the House, undertook an investigation, a very painstaking investigation, and from that committee there came a report of a bill covering not only dams and other structures in navigable streams, but the treatment of our public lands so far as water-power in the streams which run through our public lands is concerned. It passed the bill. It is a measure which is so dissimilar from the one which was considered by and adopted by the Senate that it may be said to be new legislation entirely. As I remarked the other day, the only resemblance between the bill we are now asked to send to conference and the bill passed by the Senate is that in part the present bill is concerned with dams in navigable streams.

It seems to me, Mr. President, it is fundamental that the Senate ought to have an opportunity to consider the bill which has been passed by the House. If we send it to conference the Senate never will have a chance to consider it. It will never be able to amend it in any respect. If the conferees make a report of approval then we must either adopt the report as it is presented or reject it in whole.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I think, suggested that the whole subject would be in conference. Well, let us see about that. The bill which passed the Senate provided that the Secretary of War should issue, upon application and if certain conditions were fulfilled, a permit for the erection of the structure. The bill as passed by the other House provides that a commission composed of the Secretaries of War, of the Interior, and of Agriculture shall have jurisdiction of the whole subject. Now, what is the matter which will be in conference there? The conferees would either have to adopt the House plan or the Senate plan; there would be no opportunity for a modification or for a change of the House plan; there would be no opportunity for a change or modification of the Senate plan. Either the conferees on the part of the Senate must recede from the Senate plan entirely or the House conferees must entirely recede from the plan there adopted. It is not fair; it does not tend toward good legislation to send a matter of difference of that sort to conferees.

Second. In the provision which is ordinarily known as the recapture clause, or the right which is reserved upon the part of the Government at the end of 50 years to take as its own the property which has been created, the Senate bill provided that upon that contingency the owners of the property should be paid just compensation, to be ascertained, if necessary, through the ordinary processes of condemnation. The House bill provides, under very different circumstances, but so far as this one point is concerned, that, if the United States shall take the improvement at the end of 50 years, it shall pay the net investment of the owners of the property. I should like to have some one tell me who is more familiar with the parliamentary procedure, and especially with the work of conferees, than am I what is in issue there between the conferees of the House and the Senate.

I do not believe in either plan. The plan adopted by the Senate, namely, just compensation, will result, as I attempted to show when the bill was before the Senate originally, in a great overpayment. It will result in compelling the Government of the United States to take over and pay for property upon a standard or upon a rule which must inevitably result in paying for property which it may not desire and paying for that property much more than it is fairly worth.

The House plan, the plan of paying for the net investment, will accomplish one of two things: With a successful enterprise, a water-power enterprise that has been going forward profitably, it will result, I think, in fair payment. I think it is a fair rule for a successful, profitable enterprise. It is the net investment as computed under the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission applicable to the account of railways. But with an unsuccessful enterprise, one that has languished, one that has permitted its property to deteriorate, one that has not properly taken care of depreciation, the plan adopted by the House will compel the Government to pay two, three, four, yes, five times the value of the property that may have been created and may have been operated under the permit. It is not a fair provision for recapture.

But will some one tell me what is between the conferees of the House and the Senate; how, assuming that they remain within their jurisdiction, they can accommodate that difference between the House and the Senate? Will anyone be able to tell me how the conferees can present and secure a fair rule of compensation? It can not be done. There is no compromise between those two things.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. The fair rule, and the one that is recognized, I am glad to say, by the President of the United States and by every other thoughtful man, I think, with regard to the matter, is that the owner of the property shall, if it is taken by the Government, be paid fair compensation, but not exceeding the net investment. That will provide both for the successful and the unsuccessful enterprise, and will be fair not only to the owner of the property, but to the Government also.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My first question is, Is the Government compelled at the end of 50 years to take all of these enterprises?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government is not compelled to do so——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, can it not refrain from taking those that do not pay?

Mr. CUMMINS. But it is compelled either to take them or to permit the license or the privilege to continue upon the terms that had been originally agreed upon.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The other question that I should like to ask the Senator is, With a view of obtaining some kind of legislation in this case, how will the reference of this particular matter to a separate committee ever bring the two Houses together? Would it not be similar to introducing a new bill in reference to the subject?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am assuming there may be an opportunity for compromise between the House and the Senate. There would be none whatever between the conferees from my standpoint on these fundamental points. I desire that the bill shall be taken up by the Senate, and if some one else does not do so I shall offer an amendment to the provision with regard to recapture and the compensation to be paid in that event, or I shall present an amendment which will substantially establish the rule which I have just stated, namely, that when the Government takes the property, if it does take it, it shall reimburse the owners of the property for its fair value, but shall not pay more than the net investment.

Now, let us see the difference between those two things. The just compensation, the fair value of the property, is, of course, ascertained by taking an inventory of the physical property with whatever intangible incidents may attach to it; and when that is ascertained it will be just as great in a successful enterprise as in an unsuccessful one, in one that has been carefully conducted as in one that has been negligently conducted.

In these days the theory of fair compensation or just compensation is the cost of reproduction less whatever depreciation may be found necessary in order to measure its decadence.

The net-investment theory is quite different. There if the operating company has earned a dividend upon its capital, if it has laid aside an amortization fund or a sinking fund, and if during the course of 50 years it has been able not only to pay a fair dividend upon the investment but has been able to reimburse the stockholders for their original investment, then the Government takes it for nothing; which is right, because those who have invested their money have already been repaid their money out of the proceeds of the operation of the enterprise. Every grant of every sort made by the public ought to be limited, if it is expected that the Government will ever take over the enterprise, by the consideration of the contingency that if in operation the capital has been returned the public shall not be required to pay it again.

For these reasons I am very solicitous—and I think every Senator ought to be—that the Senate shall have an opportunity to amend this bill as passed by the House in the way I have suggested, and I can not understand the viewpoint of those who insist on depriving the Senate of this chance to protect the people of this country against a rule which, in my judgment, whether as contained in the House bill or as contained in the Senate bill, will do great injustice in the future.

Take the third point. The Senate bill made no provisions whatever for a charge to the person holding the permit for the privilege of constructing the dam. Now, I am not a believer——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him in that respect?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senate bill makes no provision for a charge by the Federal Government upon the power developed, but does make express provision for the States where the waters are found to charge royalties, upon the theory, or, rather, upon the undoubted principle, that the States are the owners of this interest, this property, and they alone have the right to make a charge.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am dealing alone with the action of the Federal Government. I know the Senator from Tennessee is right and that there is a provision in the Senate bill for a charge upon the part of the States or public-utility commissions; but there is no provision in the Senate bill for any charge on the part of the Federal Government to those who are to enjoy the privilege. The House bill provides that the commission appointed to administer the law may make just such change annually as it sees fit without rule, guide, or direction of any kind. Now, I should like to know from the Senator from Tennessee what is in issue there. What would be the question in conference? What would be the jurisdiction of the conferees in dealing with that question?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, my attention was diverted from the Senator's remarks at the time, and if he will kindly repeat the question I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to know what, in the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee, the jurisdiction of the conferees would be upon the subject of making a charge to the permittee or the licensee for the use of the stream?

Mr. SHIELDS. By the Federal Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senate bill now provides for charges or royalties to be imposed by the States only. The House bill has a very broad provision authorizing the commission to impose charges in their discretion without limit in each particular case. There is no provision that it shall be the same in all cases. It allows the widest latitude for discrimination. I think that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the two positions. There can be no compromise of the question as to who owns these streams. The Federal Government or the State government; one or the other has the property; one or the other has the right to impose and collect charges and pay them into its treasury. I agree with the Senator that there is no compromise on that. Then, I will ask the Senator, both of us being of the same opinion, what possible good would it do to refer the bill upon that question to a committee? If the committee brought it back to the Senate, what could the Senate do with it? That is a question that either one or the other, the House or the Senate, would have to recede from.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; but, Mr. President, there is a large latitude of action for the Senate that would not be open to conferees. The Senate can adopt any provision, any amendment of the House bill that it sees fit to adopt, and, if it does adopt an amendment, possibly not just in accordance with the bill which formerly passed the Senate, then, if the bill goes to conference, there will be something for the conferees to consider, there will be a territory which they may occupy and upon which they may bring about a compromise between the House and the Senate. There is none now, any more than there is on the other points which I have suggested.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, is the Senator of the opinion that there can be a compromise of the question as to whether the States or the Federal Government own the property and have the right to impose a tax upon it?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion, the conferees will have no jurisdiction to consider any compromise of the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate and the bill as it passed the House if we simply refer the subject to conferees. The Senate must act upon the subject again. I do not believe—at least, it can not be taken for granted—that the Senate will not amend the House bill in some particular.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that does not answer the question that I propounded to the Senator. If there is an irreconcilable conflict between these views, how can the Senate reconcile it any more than a conference committee? I also differ with the Senator in his view that if there is a possibility of the Senate reconciling the views of the two Houses the conferees could not do so. The Senate has taken one position, the House the other. They are directly antagonistic, it is true, but whatever compromise the Senate or either House can make in such cases the conferees can do, when the action of the two Houses covers the entire subject matter, and that is the case here. I understand that the conference is for the purpose of making concessions and compromises, in order to come to a common agreement upon a subject that both Houses have covered.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee has now revealed the whole objection against sending this bill to conference. When the Senate passes one bill and the House passes another, having no connection at all with each other except that they relate in a broad way to the same subject, if it is true that upon a reference to conferees the conferees may have as great liberty and exercise as wide jurisdiction as the Senate itself could exercise or the House could exercise, then, of course, we might as well turn over to conferees the whole subject of legislation upon every matter. What is the use of 96 men sitting here and considering matters if they are finally to be determined by three or four or five men? Why should we weary ourselves with debate and with thought upon these things if, after all, the subject is to be determined by conferees? Why, you might as well have appointed a conference upon the revenue bill originally, before the House acted or before the Senate acted, if that were within parliamentary law, and allowed five men on each side to make up a revenue bill, and then brought it before the House and the Senate, subject only to be voted up or voted down, without the privilege of any modification or any amendment being brought forward by Members of the legislative body. I know that that is one of the ways in which speed is accomplished, but I think it is accomplished at very great cost.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the reference to the conference, and I hope that the Senate will finally decide to take up this bill in some form. I do not care whether it sends it to a committee or whether it takes it up upon the floor. My only insistence is that it shall be open to amendment and that the views of the Members of the Senate shall be recorded upon the proposals that have been made by the House. Thus, and thus only, can it ever be ascertained what the Senate actually believes upon the matter brought forward by the House.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	New	Smith, S. C.
Benet	Kellogg	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Kendrick	Nugent	Sterling
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thomas
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Thompson
Dillingham	Kirby	Shafroth	Trammell
Drew	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Fall	McNary	Shields	Walsh
Fletcher	Martin, Ky.	Simmons	Wilfley
Hardwick	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smith, Md.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ASHURST, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and Mr. PHELAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. HALE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the motion now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the bill, ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I trust I may have the attention for a few minutes at least of the few Members of the Senate who think this legislation important enough to require their attendance.

As has been pointed out, the bill as it was passed by the Senate dealt only with the subject of dams in navigable streams. When it went to the House everything after the enacting clause was stricken out and a bill was passed which dealt with the whole subject of power development upon the public lands as well as development in navigable streams.

The subject of the power development of dams in navigable streams has had consideration by the Senate at least twice. In substance the bill under consideration was passed by the Senate two or three years ago and again early in the present year. A separate bill entirely dealing with the subject of power development on the public lands has been pending before the Senate all of this time. It came before the Senate and was considered for some days and then was displaced by other important business. So no bill dealing with the subject of power sites upon the public lands has passed the Senate, at least within the last six years.

The bill now comes before us in such a shape as to cover both these important subjects of legislation. If the motion now pending prevails in its present form and the customs and practices of the Senate are observed the committee of conference of the Senate will be appointed solely from the Committee on Commerce which dealt with the bill as it left this body. That committee has never had before it the subject of power development upon the public lands. It seems to me, Mr. President, that is so unfair that I can not believe there is any Member of the Senate who could ask that the conference committee be made up in that way for the consideration of the bill as it is now before the Senate, returned by the House.

I have before me here a report made by the Geological Survey which designates the sections of the country in which these important power sites are located.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand the situation the bill as it left the Senate went from two committees.

Mr. WALSH. No; only one bill left the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill then in the Senate was considered by two committees, one of which had jurisdiction of navigable streams and the other of streams that were unnavigable.

Mr. WALSH. Quite right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, the House has consolidated all of them and sent it back. Why could not a conference upon the part of the Senate be formed of an equal number of both the Senate committees having original jurisdiction of the two subjects matter and let those conferees of the Senate deal with the House conferees?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has anticipated me. It was my purpose to move as an amendment to the pending motion that the conference committee on the part of the Senate be so constituted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that is a common-sense settlement of the situation, without any parliamentary technicalities.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with the Senator.

But for the purpose of impressing upon the Senate the importance, and the relative importance, for that matter, of the provisions of the pending bill dealing with power development upon the public lands, I read from page 200 of the hearings on this subject before the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, Sixty-third Congress, a table taken from the report of the Geological Survey for the year 1909, as follows:

Of a total of 61,678,000 potential horsepower in the United States the North Atlantic States have 4,910,000; the South Atlantic States, 5,107,000; the North Central States, 4,270,000; the South Central States, 3,342,000; and the Western States, 44,049,000. In other words, of the 61,000,000 available horsepower the Western States have 44,049,000, practically all of it more or less affected by the portion of the bill dealing with power development on the public lands.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I did not quite understand from the Senator's statement whether the bill which was considered in the Senate and which dealt with nonnavigable streams or streams upon the public domain ever passed the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. No; it did not.

In view of this situation, Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the pending motion:

"That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President of the Senate, three members of the Committee on Commerce and three members of the Committee on Public Lands; that the President take the advice of the chairman of each of the said committees as to the members coming from the same, selection to be made without regard by the rule of seniority, so that the chairman of each committee shall designate such members of his committee as in his judgment may best deal with the subject."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, an amendment of that kind, it seems to me, drawn in that shape is rather unwise. I will say to the Senator from Montana that it has always been the practice here that the minority of a committee should be represented on a conference, and, of course, while there is nothing in the amendment offered by the Senate to prohibit that, when appointed by the chairman of the committee he could appoint all from the majority members of the committee. I hardly think he would, but why not let the appointment of the committee be just the same as it always has been in the past? The chairman of the committee or the Senator having in charge the bill always hands the names of the conferees to the Presiding Officer, and those Senators are always appointed by the Presiding Officers as conferees. I think that would be the best rule to follow at this time. If the Senator could confine his motion to so many members of each of the committees to be appointed, I think that would cover the ground just as well as to designate how they should be selected.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I never thought of excluding the minority from representation upon the conference committee, and I am very certain that neither the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands nor the chairman of the Committee on Commerce would think of excluding Members from such representation on the conference committee. That matter being disposed of, I will explain to the Senator why I so provide.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator begins his explanation, I should like to call his attention to the other matter I have in mind, and then he can explain both points.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is unwise to say that the appointment shall be made irrespective of the seniority of the members of the committee. That can be done anyway without any order, and it seems to me that it is unnecessary.

Mr. WALSH. It can be done. I put it in simply because it has been done. When the bill passed the Senate before it went to a conference committee upon an agreement between the two Houses, my recollection is that it went to a conference committee not selected by the rule of seniority, and I took it that the Committee on Commerce would like to have the same conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. More than likely they would. They were appointed before without reference to their seniority or without any order from the Senate, and it seems to me at this time that the best course to pursue would be to make a motion that so many members of each of the committees shall be appointed as conferees.

Mr. WALSH. I will simply say with respect to that, Mr. President, that it is perfectly satisfactory to me either to have the rule of seniority followed or not to have it followed. If it is not going to be followed in the Committee on Commerce, I simply do not desire the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to be under any kind of constraint to follow the rule of seniority.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor would he be.

Mr. WALSH. Either course is altogether satisfactory to me; but I do not want the Committee on Commerce to make their appointment without any regard to the rule of seniority; and then the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands feel that he is under constraint to follow some other rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not conceive what fear there is in the mind of the Senator at this time. Under the practice of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is not bound at any time to suggest the conferees according to seniority. It is true that it is generally done. I do not know anything about what either of the committees is going to do, but it does seem to me that it ought to be left, as it always is left, to the discretion of the chairmen of the two committees.

Mr. WALSH. If it were left to the entire discretion of the chairmen of the committees and they did not feel under any obligation at all to observe the rule of seniority, as I said, that will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Florida. He first rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to say just at this time for the information of the Senator and any others who may be interested that the bill was originally considered in the Commerce Committee by a subcommittee composed of three Senators, members of that committee, and those members of the subcommittee practically on the floor here had charge of the bill and were afterwards named as conferees when the bill passed the Senate and went to the House. Of course the practice is here on a motion of this kind to have the chairman of the committee which has had charge of the legislation suggest to the Chair certain members who are ordinarily appointed by the Chair. I have no hesitation in saying that when I made this motion I suggested to the Chair the same members of the Commerce Committee who were appointed before and who composed the subcommittee which considered the bill in the Commerce Committee. It did not include myself, although I am chairman of the committee. I thought it well to continue as representing the Senate those members who were most familiar with this legislation by reason of their active interest in it as members of the subcommittee and members of the general committee and apparently here on the floor.

I took the liberty also, at the suggestion of the Committee on Public Lands, to suggest two members of that committee, and I understood that to be entirely satisfactory to the members of that committee. At any rate they are members whom both the chairman of the Commerce Committee and the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands are ready to suggest to the Chair when it comes to naming the conferees. That is a concession to the Public Lands Committee and a concession to the features of this bill which were not passed upon by the Commerce Committee before, and a concession, I think, quite unusual, because it is a bill which has been before the Commerce Committee, and when we ask for a conference on a bill we generally select the conferees from the committee which has had the bill in charge. It is unusual to go outside of the membership of that committee to select conferees; but, as I said, out of deference to the views which have been expressed here, and especially in view of this feature of the bill which has been added in the House, respecting the development of waterpower on public lands, I thought it was fair and just to have included in the conferees appointed by the Chair representatives from the Committee on Public Lands.

I do not think, however, that it is quite fair and reasonable to expect the same representation from the Committee on Public Lands as from the Committee on Commerce. Notwithstanding the fact that the bill as it comes to us includes this feature, namely, the development of water power in streams, navigable or otherwise, passing through public lands, particularly nonnavigable streams passing through public lands, I should say 90 per cent of this bill is the Commerce Committee bill. The principles developed in the Senate before and through the Commerce Committee are the principles to the extent of some 90 per cent of this measure that are now embodied in the bill before the Senate. I scarcely think that the Committee on Public Lands ought to ask that they have an equal representation on the conference. If there are three members from the Commerce Committee and two from the Public Lands Committee, it seems to me that is a better arrangement and a more just arrangement than to have three from each committee. In the first place, three from each committee makes an even number, whereas the other makes an odd number. I think five is a sufficient number, and that an apportionment of three to the Commerce Committee and two to the Public Lands Committee would be a fair and just apportionment.

I have no choice at all, of course, in reference to the naming of the members of the Public Lands Committee. I am willing to leave that entirely to the chairman of that committee or to any motion that may be adopted by the Senate specifying how those members are to be selected. My understanding is that the committee would be satisfied with the two whom I have suggested to the Chair. For the reasons mentioned, I am inclined to oppose to some extent, at least, the motion of the Senator from Montana. I believe it would be better to leave the matter in the shape it is in, to be worked out in accordance with the practice of the Senate heretofore.

Mr. WALSH. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say merely a word or two. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that while I am a member of the Commerce Committee and was a member of the subcommittee that helped to draft the preceding power bill that went to conference and this bill, I have a great deal of sympathy with the suggestion he makes regarding the membership of the conference, especially its membership from the Public Lands Committee. I should like to see him leave out the suggestion in his motion with reference to whether the members should be appointed by seniority or not. I think it would be best to leave that to the practice of the Senate as heretofore pursued and just provide for the appointment of conferees from each of the committees, the appointments to be made as we always make them.

Now, regarding the membership of the conference committee, I rather sympathize with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana that there ought to be three members of the Public Lands Committee on that conference. The bill as it comes back from the House is in effect two bills. One is a bill that the Commerce Committee reported and the Senate passed, with what changes the House made with reference to it, and the other is a bill relating entirely to public lands, with which the Public Lands Committee have been dealing for a long time, about which they have had very extensive hearings, and to which they have given a great deal of consideration. It is in effect two bills.

If there is anything incorporated in the motion of the Senator from Montana besides the mere provision for the number of conferees, I think it ought to be that no agreement shall be reached by the conferees upon the public-land provisions except upon the agreement of a majority of the members of the conference on the Public Lands Committee. So, in effect, we shall have really two sets of conferees from the Senate, one to deal with the public-land provisions and the other to deal with the commerce provisions. I should like to see the conferees appointed, at any rate, with an understanding of that kind, and I believe there ought to be three conferees from the Public Lands Committee as well as three from the Commerce Committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, replying to the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I desire to say that I was not to be understood as making any criticism whatever of the appointment of the committee of conference heretofore from that committee or of its purpose now in the appointment of a committee of conference to depart from the rule of seniority.

In a conference with my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, he felt, however, some kind of restraint about departing from the rule of seniority. That is why I insist upon this provision in my motion, so as to relieve him from any embarrassment about selecting the members of the Committee on Public Lands. I think it quite appropriate that the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce having the matter under consideration should be appointed members of the conference committee; and I am not to be understood as offering any criticism of that whatever.

I must express my surprise, however, that the Senator from Florida, who is usually eminently fair and just, stands on the floor here and advocates giving the Committee on Commerce a preference in the appointment of the conferees, giving that committee a majority of the conferees on the part of this body. My proposition addressed itself obviously to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] as a very fair and reasonable one.

Mr. President, that causes me to say a word or two more. Notwithstanding the fact that the power sites upon the public domain in extent are double the power sites in all other sections of the country combined, the western Representatives have never yet been able to get consideration before this body of a measure dealing with a subject of such transcendent importance as this. They have never even had an opportunity to get the matter considered seriously by this body.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, that is not peculiar. I regret to say that we never have these questions of first importance to our section of the country, these great questions concerning the disposition of the public land, up for consideration before this body that the Senate does not empty itself, except of the few of us who are immediately and directly concerned.

Mr. President, the other day there were some severe strictures made upon Members of the House, possibly upon one member of the conference committee, on what is known as the oil-leasing bill, because it was said that that body would only act with reference to the leasing bill as was suggested to them by certain officers of the Cabinet, and it was charged as something in the nature of a surrender of their functions. I suppose the situation over there is just the same as it is here. Four-fifths of the Members of the House in all probability do just the same as Senators do, when these matters come up they vacate the Chamber. They do not know anything about these questions. They do not study them at all, and when it comes to vote they take advice and counsel as to how they ought to vote from some other source. A great many of them have confidence in some members of the Cabinet, and go to them and say, "How do you think I ought to vote?" That is where the trouble comes.

Now, I am going to appeal to the Senate at this time, the last chance we are going to have on this matter, to give us a conference committee on the part of the Senate, at least, one-half of which shall be constituted of members of the Committee on Public Lands, who have given some consideration, at least, to the important subject of power sites upon the public domain, 44,000,000 out of 61,000,000 horsepower in the whole country.

Mr. President, where has the great development of water power in this country within the last 10 years taken place? It has taken place in the western section of our country. We are pioneers in the use of electrical power for the operation of commercial lines of railroad. We are practically the pioneers in the use of electrical power for great mining operations, for great metallurgical operations, and all that kind of thing. The question is one of vast importance to our part of the country; and yet the proposition is seriously suggested upon the floor here by one of my colleagues that in dealing with this subject the Committee on Commerce ought to have three members of the conference and the Committee on Public Lands two.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator speaks of the comparative development within the last 10 or 15 years in the Western States and the States east of the Mississippi River, where the navigable streams chiefly lie. I wish to know whether or not those western developments have been on navigable streams?

Mr. WALSH. Very few of them.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it not a fact that the reason why there has been no development on navigable streams is because it is impossible under the present legislation upon the statute books?

Mr. WALSH. I think so, as well as upon the public land.

Mr. SHIELDS. All the development really has been made on streams that are not subject to that legislation and not controlled by it.

Mr. WALSH. That is correct. The development has been made chiefly where the power sites are held in private ownership, not upon public lands or in streams on public lands.

Mr. President, it is a matter of no consequence to me whether that provision of the amendment which I have offered shall find favor with the Senate or not. I am just simply presenting the situation to you. It is perfectly agreeable to me either that the rule of seniority should be preserved in both committees or should be disregarded in both.

Mr. President, with that I desire to say, and I desire to say without any regard to what the composition of the conference committee will be, that I hope this bill will go to conference. I do not believe any great good will come by sending the bill at this time to a special committee, which will probably hold extensive hearings, and then return the bill to the Senate, where it will be debated and discussed at very considerable length, much the same ground being traveled over that has been traveled over in the Senate twice, and, in part, three times already; and in the end it must go to a conference committee.

If the subject had never had the consideration of the Senate at all, if the whole matter had not been thoroughly debated, if the sense of the Senate had not been taken upon every real controverted question in the matter, there would be much in the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], whose views upon this subject are entitled to very respectful consideration, for I know that he has given earnest thought and study to the subject. But, Mr. President, while it is true that the bill which came from the House is quite different from the bill which passed the Senate, yet we all know that, except for matters of detail, the controversy has always centered about two questions, and two questions only, in this whole subject: First, upon the question as to whether an annual charge shall be made by the Federal Government; and, second, as to the provisions under which the property shall be retaken by the Government at the expiration of the franchise period.

I am not able to agree with the Senator from Iowa that there is no difference between the two Houses to be adjusted. Take the question of an annual Federal charge to begin with. The bill which left the Senate makes no provision whatever for such an annual charge. That view is stoutly maintained by many Members of the Senate, and I dare say it is held perhaps by a majority of the Senate. It is not my view.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator refers to the charge by the Federal Government?

Mr. WALSH. I mean the charge by the Federal Government in consideration of the grant of a franchise. On the contrary, Mr. President, the House bill contains the following provisions to be found at page 37:

(e) That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission.

There, of course, is a straight difference between the two Houses, and the conference committee will be called upon accordingly to deal with that particular subject; and inasmuch as the Senate refuses to impose any charge at all and the House has provided what the charge shall be and how it shall be arrived at, that is a difference that can be adjusted. The House provision can be accepted or a compromise can be offered or some other provision can be made upon the subject.

The other subject of difference, Mr. President, is, as I have said, the conditions under which the recapture is to take place. That is provided for in the Senate bill at page 10, the provision being that at any time after the expiration of 50 years, and so on, the United States may take over the property upon paying to the grantee just compensation therefor. That is the Senate idea. The House, on the contrary, advances the net-investment idea, as follows:

SEC. 14. That upon not less than two years' notice in writing from the commission the United States shall have the right, upon or after the expiration of any license, to take over and thereafter to maintain and operate any project or projects, * * * upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the net investment of the licensee in the project or projects taken.

So that matter is in difference between the two Houses, as it always has been in difference, and the conference committee will be entitled, as a matter of course, to take up that subject and deal with it as in its wisdom seems best.

It is true that the Senate bill does not make provision for the construction of dams in streams which are theoretically navigable, but which in fact are not navigable; that is, streams that are regarded by the War Department as being navigable, but upon which there is really no navigation. The House bill does not contain that. So that matter is in difference. The Senate has declared itself upon that question, so that will fall within the jurisdiction of the conference committee.

Likewise, Mr. President, the House bill provides for the creation of a commission by which the licenses shall be issued, that commission to consist of the three Secretaries. The Senate bill contains no such provision. The Senate conferees may either accede to the provision found in the House bill or provide for some other kind of commission, if that would seem wise, as a substitute. So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the bill is now in such shape that it can be very properly considered by a conference committee and a report made, which, with the discussions that have already taken place, will be all that is requisite.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say, except to advert briefly to the very learned and interesting argument made a few days ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. At the outset of his argument I was lead to believe that the Senator was advocating the dismissal of every project that has thus far been advanced by either House for the solution of this great question of water-power development, the absolute disregard of all such projects, and the substitution, in lieu of all of them, of some plan for municipal, State, and Federal development and control. Mr. President, this matter has had the very earnest consideration of both Houses of Congress ever since I came to the Senate, some five and a half years ago. Of course, the question has been alive at least since 1909. The necessity for some legislation upon the subject has been apparent to every student of public questions since that time; and until now I can not recall a single instance in which it was proposed that these power sites shall lie idle for all time, until appropriations are made by Congress for their development, or by States, or by municipalities. I trust we shall not now listen to any suggestion that will absolutely defeat all of the pending legislation, start in anew, and endeavor to devise some new system of municipal, State, or Federal development.

It is true that many a municipality, finding close at hand a power site, might, with extreme profit to its citizens, go out and develop that power site for the purpose of taking care of its municipal needs. Under favorable circumstances it might not only make a development adequate to take care of its own municipal needs, but one adequate to provide power for industrial enterprises within its borders or in its immediate vicinity.

The city of Los Angeles, under a special grant from Congress, has done so to the great advantage and profit of its citizens. It has a great grant from the Government, which it has developed at an enormous cost. The power is supplied to its street railways and is used for the lighting of the houses of the city, and, as well, Mr. President, it supplies power to great industrial enterprises in the region all around. More important than that, it supplies power to raise water for irrigation purposes, so that immense tracts of land in the immediate vicinity of the city are put under cultivation, to the great advantage of the people who reside in the city and the general benefit of the whole country. But, Mr. President, those are exceptional instances.

In my own State, in the county adjacent to the one in which I live, there is a little town of perhaps less than 1,000 people. They have gone up into the mountains, a distance of 10 or 15 miles, and have there developed a hundred horsepower, which is adequate to furnish power for the lighting of their little city. But, Mr. President, we can not rely upon enterprises of that kind for the development of the great power sites of the country.

The power site at Priest Rapids has been referred to from time to time in the discussion of this subject. It is in the Columbia River, at a point where that river is crossed by the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. There can be developed an aggregate of at least 400,000 horsepower. The initial cost of power development is not ordinarily less than $100 per horsepower. That means an investment of $40,000,000 for the development of that power site. Shall we allow that to remain idle and undeveloped and unimproved? Shall we allow the waters to run away, as they have run away since time began, without utilization at all, until some municipality in the State of Washington undertakes to obligate itself to the extent of $40,000,000 for the development of that power? What municipality will do it?

Unfortunately neither of the Senators from Washington is here, but if they were present I should ask the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] or the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] what the probabilities are that the city of Spokane, for instance, or the State of Washington will go out and undertake to develop a water power at an expense of $40,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator from Montana think that $40,000,000 could be secured from any source under this bill for the development of that water power?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. President, that diverts me from my argument, but I will answer the Senator from Colorado, and answer him with perfect frankness about the matter. Senators have all encountered Mr. Pierce, who is interested in that power site, and he hopes, if this bill gets through, to get a franchise to develop it. He says that he can raise the money to develop that power site under the House bill, with some small amendments, which he feels can be made. I do not know whether the money can be raised or not, but the man who wants the opportunity to develop the power says that it can be raised.

Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Colorado again, that another gentleman has been here for a long time from my State—Mr. Harris—who is interested in the development of what is known as the Big Horn Canyon power site. There can be developed something like 125,000 horsepower. That means an investment of from twelve and a half to fifteen million dollars. Mr. Harris tells me that he believes he can raise the money for the development under the House bill, with some amendments to it. I have given the Senator from Colorado what information I have.

But, Mr. President, let me proceed. Take the great power site at The Dalles in the Columbia River. That site is capable of developing 500,000 horsepower; that means an investment of $50,000,000. The city of Portland, the greatest city there is in that section of the country, has not any intention, has not any thought, of going into the development of The Dalles power site signifying an investment of $50,000,000. Take my own State; take the Polson power site on the Pend Oreille River, which is capable of developing 225,000 horsepower; that means an investment of $25,000,000. There is not a municipality in my State that is going to undertake that development; neither is the State of Montana going to undertake it.

Moreover, Mr. President, everybody must recognize that these power developments are great big business enterprises. When you have the power developed, you have got to find a market for it; you have got to go out and induce industrial enterprises to establish themselves within the radius which can be supplied from the particular development; you have got to go out and induce householders to use the electrical power for household purposes, as has been done in many sections of the country; you have got to develop a business, and you have got to run it on business principles. Ordinarily a municipality is not organized so as to run a great big business enterprise of this character with success.

As I have said, under peculiar circumstances and usually with reference to small developments, municipalities may develop them very well, and the House bill makes provision for just such cases. I have not been able to find the corresponding provision in the Senate bill, if there is one; but the House bill provides—I read from page 33—as follows:

> SEC. 7. That in issuing preliminary permits or licenses hereunder the commission shall give preference to applications therefor by States and municipalities, provided the plans for the same are deemed by the commission adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region.

The bill further provides that whenever one makes an application for a franchise under its provisions he must for a period of eight weeks advertise the fact in some paper printed in the county in which the development is to take place. When one has thus made his application and has advertised, if a municipality itself desires to develop that power it may come in and apply to do so, and its application must be given preference over the application of the private party or corporation. So every opportunity is given under the bill for municipal development if the municipalities will develop; but we object to any scheme or plan which will keep these power sites idle until the municipalities may prepare at some time in the remote future to develop them.

But I understood the Senator from Idaho eventually, Mr. President, not to urge, as seemed to be his idea in the first place—at least, as I gathered it—that these power sites be kept idle and unproductive until the municipalities got ready to develop them. He simply desired to give the municipality the preference, and if the municipality did not desire to exercise that preference, then the private party or corporation might do the development. He complained, however, about the provision in this bill under which, he said, a discretion was left with the commission as to whether or not they would give preference to the municipality. Mr. President, the only discretion given to the commission under the provisions of the House bill is that they must give the preference to the municipality, provided their plans contemplate the development to the extent to which the site is capable of being developed; in other words, if a municipality desired to make a development of, we will say, only 5,000 horsepower in the case of a site that was capable of developing 50,000 horsepower and there were private parties or a public utility corporation desirous of getting a permit to develop the entire 50,000 horsepower, then the preference to the municipality would not obtain; in other words, the idea is to have these power sites developed to their full capacity. If a municipality undertakes to develop or decides to develop a power site to its full capacity, it has the preference under this proposed law. So, Mr. President, I do not think that provision ought to be changed, and I express that view for the benefit of the conferees, if the bill shall go to conference, for whatever it may be worth. These are great resources, and they ought to be developed to their utmost capacity; every opportunity ought to be given to the municipalities and to the States to make the developments, if they desire to do so; but when they do not desire to do so—and in many cases it will be entirely impossible for them to do so—we should invite private capital to develop these resources for us.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not believe that there is a Member of the Senate, and I am sure that there is not a member of the Committee on Commerce, who does not feel that the Committee on Public Lands should have representation on the proposed conference committee, but it seems to me that we are going to create a very awkward situation. If three members of the Public Lands Committee and three members of the Committee on Commerce are appointed on this conference committee and they fail to agree upon important matters, how are we ever going to get a bill of any kind? The bill reported by the Committee on Commerce and passed by the Senate has a double significance; it not only deals with water powers, but it deals with navigation on navigable rivers in connection with water-power development, and it appears that the question of navigation on navigable rivers is growing in importance all the time.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing, and have frequently expressed the opinion, that the public-land States should have all the legislation that is necessary in order to enable them properly to develop their water-power resources and facilities. I am willing that they should have all they need and perhaps more than they ought to have. I have gone further, Mr. President, than have the western Senators, for I have said frequently that I hoped the day would soon come when under proper restrictions all the public lands would be turned over to the States to handle and manage for their own benefit. I think that ought to be done; but perhaps that is a long way off, and it has nothing to do with the present situation.

I do not care who is appointed on the conference committee, if one shall be created, from the Committee on Public Lands, nor do I care who is appointed from the Committee on Commerce. I have no particular desire to deal with this question; I have been bothering my brain with it for 10 years and have not accomplished very much, but if this conference committee is composed of six Members, three from each of the two committees, and they shall fail to agree I should like to have some Senator suggest a remedy.

How are we going to get the bill out of such a committee and get it enacted into law? I do not know of any way to do it, because under all the rules governing conferences a majority must agree in the report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I hope we shall be able to agree on this bill in some way or other. I do not anticipate any difficulties such as the Senator from Alabama fears.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know that there will be such a difficulty.

Mr. WALSH. But, if there should be, I would be very glad to make the suggestion to him that an additional member be selected from the Committee on Agriculture, the ranking member of the committee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, we will discuss that when we come to it.

Mr. WALSH. I think that would be quite proper, because the State of the Senator from Oregon is interested in both aspects of the measure—the navigable feature of it and the public-lands feature of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not know that there is going to be any trouble about an agreement; I am not supposing that there will be; but, if there should be, I am simply inquiring what the remedy is; that is all. I have no objection to appointing three members of the Public Lands Committee if the Public Lands Committee so desires, and I do not care who are appointed on the committee; that does not make a particle of difference to me, so far as I am concerned. What I want is a bill that will insure power development on navigable streams, and I want a bill that will enable the public-land States to develop their power. It may be that we will have no trouble in conference, if I should be one of the conferees, in agreeing upon a bill of that character. I hope there will not be; but, as I have said, the question of the development of water power on navigable rivers has a double significance, for it is just as important to develop the navigation on our rivers as it is to develop power; and the Commerce Committee has given long and patient study to that subject. That is all I care to say. I hope the Senate will pass upon this question, and either send the bill to conference or send it to a committee or some other place which they may select. I do not care a straw what they do, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am not going into a discussion of the merits of this bill either as it passed the Senate or as it was amended by the House. I do not think it is necessary to do so at this time. Everyone agrees that there are differences of the most material character between the bill passed by the Senate and that passed by the House, and there must be very material modifications of the views of both Houses before that bill can be enacted into law. There are many of the general principles governing the development of water power that are common to both of these bills, and are to be found in them both; in fact, I think in large measure the bills, while expressed in different phraseology, are practically the same, although there are very material and very serious differences that have been entertained by the two Houses for many years, as shown by bills passed by both of them.

The only question that is now before the Senate is whether or not the Senate shall disagree to the amendment of the House and whether conferees shall be appointed.

The matter had been discussed between members of the Commerce Committee and the Public Lands Committee as to the relative representation of the two committees upon the conference committee to be appointed. The chairman of the Commerce Committee and members of that committee readily agreed that the Public Lands Committee should be represented but not that they should control the matter. They agreed to this on account of the fact that the House has included in the amendment made to the Senate bill legislation affecting streams upon the public lands, a matter not included in the Senate bill. I think it is fair for the Public Lands Committee to be represented. The Commerce Committee proposed that the conferees be composed of three from the Commerce Committee and two from the Public Lands Committee. No method of selecting them was considered or agreed upon. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is at perfect liberty to adopt the method he thinks best and which is according to the practice of the Senate.

I believe that that is the fair way to proceed in this matter, and that it is just to both committees. As has been repeatedly said in the Senate, this bill was originally in charge of the Commerce Committee. It has the preference. Ordinarily, under the usages and practices of the Senate, when a bill of this kind is returned by the House, if a conference is agreed upon the conferees are appointed entirely from the Commerce Committee; and that part of them shall be from the other committee—the Committee on Public Lands—is a concession upon the part of the Commerce Committee.

The statement made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], showing the relative interest of the public-land States and that of what we might call the navigable-stream States is not altogether clear as to the facts. It is not full, and is really misleading when we consider the questions involved and to be considered by the Public Lands Committee. Ninety per cent of this bill relates as much to the navigable streams as it does to the streams on the public lands; and that is true notwithstanding the statistics show that the greatest amount of undeveloped water power in the United States is in what are known as the public-land States. It grows out of two facts—one, that the great volume of the power in the public-land States is not on navigable streams and a bill affecting navigable streams only does not affect it; the other, the fact that the only difference regarding legislation for the development of water power to be found in this bill as amended by the House is in those provisions providing for the lease of dam sites and of transmission lines through and over the public lands.

I will read the clause providing for these matters. I will only read that part applicable to the question I am discussing. It is the provision for licensing parties or municipalities desiring to make developments; and it is said that it may be done—

For the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, or other project works necessary or convenient for the development and improvement of navigation, and for the development, transmission, and utilization of power across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States (including the Territories), or for the purpose of utilizing the surplus water or water power from any nagivation dam.

It is readily seen that the provisions of the bill are confined to navigable streams in every respect, except a provision for the leasing of public lands when necessary for dam sites, or sites for construction works, or transmission lines. Every other principle of the bill applies to navigable streams. The appointment of the commission, the rates to be charged, the royalties to be charged, the manner of regulation—everything, in fact, except this one matter of leasing public lands—apply to waters wherever you find them, whether in the public-land States or in what are known as the navigable-stream States, which would be those contiguous to the Mississippi River and lying east of it in the United States. In fact, there are two great regions where water power is found in the United States—that is, in the Rocky Mountains and in the Appalachian Mountains—one of them west of the Mississippi River, and the other east of it; the navigable streams nearly all lying east of the Mississippi River, with notable exceptions.

Another question showing the greater interest of the Commerce Committee in this legislation is the fact that this measure relates to navigation, and that committee has the sole charge of all bills relating to the navigation of rivers in the United States—as has already been said, an interest equally important with that of the development of water power. So, when we get down to the question as to which committee has the greater interest in this matter, the Commerce Committee has at least three-fourths of it. I think I state it very moderately when I say that. It has jurisdiction over three-fourths of the interests involved in this legislation, sole interest in navigation, and fully as much in water power that is subject to the provisions of this bill. That being so, I think it is a very liberal concession to give the Public Lands Committee two of the conferees, and for the Commerce Committee to retain its control of three.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. A very important part of this bill relates to the distribution or transmission of power among or between the States. Why do you eliminate the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate Commerce? I agree that the Committee on Commerce has to deal with the improvement of waters so that they will be better adapted for navigation; but why do you not give the Committee on Interstate Commerce a show when it comes to the provisions which relate to commerce among the States in the transmission or distribution of power?

I am moved to ask that question because the Senator was just trying to explain why part of this jurisdiction should go to the Committee on Commerce, part of it to the Committee on Public Lands, and so on. Now, I ask him, as long as you are making up a conference committee upon new and unusual principles, why not take in the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the only reason I can give the Senator is that the interest of the Interstate Commerce Committee is so small as to be negligible; and no one ever before thought that it had jurisdiction of the matters involved in this bill sufficient to be considered in connection with it. There are only a few cases where the power crosses State lines, and where interstate commerce would be involved; and it is very doubtful whether it is involved there or not.

This is all I care to say about the question involved. I favor the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I think it ought to be adopted, and that without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair is advised, it is an amendment to the motion submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is that six conferees be appointed, three from the Committee on Commerce and three from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that the rule of seniority be disregarded?

Mr. WALSH. Without reference to the rule of seniority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I was just asking what the motion was.

Mr. WALSH. That selection be made without regard to the rule of seniority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that there is no rule of seniority here in forming conference committees; and if the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the chairman of the Public Lands Committee, is embarrassed in any way, I can say, as far as I am concerned as one of the minority members of the committee, that he need not take me into consideration at all. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Montana will strike out that part of his motion.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. So do I.

Mr. WALSH. I hope that, whether the rule of seniority is regarded or is not regarded, the Senator from Utah will be appointed a member of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to go off the conference; and I do not want the chairman of the Public Lands Committee to feel at all embarrassed, but to pass me over and select any other member of the committee that he desires.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I think the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands now feels that he is at perfect liberty, without injuring the feelings of anybody, to disregard the rule of seniority, so I ask leave to withdraw that portion of the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the motion or question divisible? In other words, will we have an opportunity to vote first upon the question of disagreement and the request for a conference and then upon the method of selecting the conference committee? [A pause.] May I say a word while the Chair is reflecting upon that question? I am very much interested——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Iowa that the present occupant of the Chair thinks there are two separate questions involved in the pending proposal and that it is competent to divide or segregate them and vote upon them separately, the first question being as to whether the Senate shall disagree to the amendment of the House and ask for a conference; and if a disagreement is ordered and a conference asked, then the Senate can vote upon the question as to the manner of selecting the conferees.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I am not interested in the last question so much as I am in the first. I am very much opposed——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I want to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that, parliamentarily, my amendment, of course, will be first voted on. I offered an amendment to the pending motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH. And the question is, Shall we amend the motion made by the chairman of the Commerce Committee so as to provide that three members of the conference committee shall be selected from the Committee on Commerce and three from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I again say that I am not so much interested in the manner of selecting the managers on the part of the Senate as I am in preserving the right of the Senate to consider this bill, although I have no doubt that the method proposed by the Senator from Montana is the more equitable plan; but the mere fact that we are attempting to negotiate with each other with regard to the selection of conferees—caused, I assume, by the known or unknown attitude of the proposed conferees toward the questions at issue—furnishes conclusive proof that this bill is not yet ready to send to conference. If you will give the Senate an opportunity to consider the House bill, and narrow to understandable limits the differences which may appear, so that they can be defined and perceived, we will have no trouble in the selection of conferees.

I agree that it would be intolerable to send the bill to conferees who had no other interest in the matter than the interest which arises out of navigable waters, just as it would be entirely unjust to send it to a conference committee that had no information, other than general information respecting the subject, save that which grows out of the streams on our public domain.

That is a situation which is simply deplorable. Here we have a bill which has never yet been considered by a committee having jurisdiction of both these subjects or having made investigations concerning both, and we are trying to make up by private negotiation a conference committee that may be able to grasp the subject and to do justice to it. Who ever heard of a proposal of that kind? And yet it is absolutely necessary, if we send the bill to conference in this situation.

If you will follow out the suggestion or the motion that I made, and which I understood to be entirely satisfactory to the members of the Committees on Public Lands and Commerce, in the event we did not go to conference immediately—namely, that this bill be referred to a special committee, to be composed of an equal number of members of the Committee on Commerce and of the Committee on Public Lands—there you have a committee having a single organization, but composed of Senators who have given study to these two phases of the great subject. They would take the bill, and, after having considered it and after having taken evidence upon it if they so desired, they would report to the Senate the bill which in their judgment ought to become the law of the land. A very large part of the differences that now appear would then be dismissed. I venture to say that the differences between the Senate and the House then would not be what they are theoretically now, because I agree with the Senator from Montana that we have never taken up the subject in a serious and determined way, believing that we were shortly to arrive at legislation; and I am in favor of doing it. I think it is a great, important subject, and we are now preparing to deal with it in the most unintelligent way that I can conceive. I predict that instead of forwarding legislation, instead of facilitating the development of these great powers, if we send this bill to conference in the present form, we will place in the way of legislation an obstacle that it will require a long time to remove.

Mr. President, I ask for a division of the question, first, that relating to the method of selecting the conferees, and, second, that relating to disagreement and asking for a conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Iowa that the motion which he mentions as second will have to be put first, under what the Chair understands to be the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not arranging the order of putting the question. I am asking for a division of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. A division will be ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on Saturday the Senator from Iowa gave notice that he would move that the pending measure be referred to a special committee for consideration. I sincerely hope that this motion will prevail and that the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. FLETCHER] will be defeated. This measure is one, to use the language of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], of "transcendent importance"; it affects all portions of our country, but particularly the public-land States.

The House bill embarks our country upon a dangerous sea with an unknown haven. The uniform holdings of the courts of our land have been that the waters within the States were owned by the States in trust for the people. The Federal Government has no ownership or interest in nonnavigable waters, and its interest in navigable streams is limited to the prevention of their use so as to interfere with navigation. Under the power to control interstate commerce the Federal Government may prevent obstructions within the navigable streams which would impede or interfere with their navigability. The bill sent to this body from the House, if I correctly interpret it, is a radical departure from the views which have obtained for more than a century, and will deprive the States of their ownership in and control of the streams found therein, both navigable and unnavigable. There is no question but what there is a deep-seated purpose to place the Federal Government in control of all the waters found within all the States. The contention will be made, if this bill should become a law, that in controlling navigable streams for power purposes the Federal Government has the right to control all the tributaries and sources of supply of such navigable streams. In the public-land States the House bill places the Federal Government in control of all streams capable of producing power, and fastens upon the people a licensing system oppressive and obnoxious.

But what I rose to state was that, to my mind, it is manifestly unfair to force a measure of this character through the Senate without giving an opportunity for consideration and for amendments to the same. The Senate of the Sixty-fifth Congress has never considered many of the questions involved in the House bill. The bill which passed the Senate and for which the present measure is a substitute did not relate to the public lands and the question of the Government controlling the waters of the public-land States for power purposes. It must be remembered that 20 to 30 Members of the present Senate took their seats in this body on the 4th of March, 1917. During the past 15 months 10 of the Members of this body have been called by death, so there is a large part of the membership of this body that has never had any opportunity to consider these important questions, so vital not only to their States but to the Union.

It is quite likely in a general way they have given some thought to the question of the use of streams of our land for power purposes, but they have not had the opportunity to consider proposed legislation in relation to this important subject. The proposition now is that a measure which has come from the House shall be sent to a conference committee. The Members of the Senate are to be denied any opportunity to fully and fairly consider this bill or to offer any amendments thereto. It is said that when the conferees agree upon the question and report back to the Senate an opportunity will then be afforded for Senators to give expression to their views. Mr. President, it is true that if the conferees agree to report this, or a modified measure, back to their respective bodies, we will then have an opportunity here to discuss, not the bill, but the conference report. That is to say, we may discuss the principles of the bill, but we will have no opportunity to amend the bill, no matter how imperfect or dangerous or destructive it may be. We will be compelled to accept the conference report and the bill submitted without the slightest modifications, or we will be compelled to reject it in its entirety. It is obvious that such a course is unfair. There may be some Senators to whom the bill, so reported, will be most obnoxious, and yet they may feel constrained, because of some meritorious features, to vote for it rather than to get no legislation. It is a dangerous, indeed a vicious manner of legislating. It is legislation by compulsion. It prevents fair consideration or deliberation. Mr. President, this bill, I repeat, is a dangerous bill. As I understand it, it is a deadly thrust at the rights of the States. It is in harmony with many of the measures which receive powerful support in these hours, calculated to destroy the States and to create a strongly consolidated and centralized Government.

The Federal Government ought to cede to the States the public lands found therein. It ought not to place its strong hand upon the property of the States and to build up a dangerous and destructive paternalism. It is not in harmony with Anglo-Saxon principles and our theory and form of government to constitute a Federal Government a powerful and omnipotent paternalism. The thought of the Federal Government going into the States and controlling the waters, which are owned by the States and the people, and granting licenses to those who use the waters, and to institute a system which makes the Federal Government a landlord and the people servants and tenants, is so obnoxious as to excite my opposition to proposed schemes and legislation embodying such views. A measure so important as this ought to be fully considered by the Senate. There should be full opportunity to the new Senators to express their views upon the question, to offer amendments to the pending bill, and to aid in securing legislation which meets their views.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Utah that the Senate bill was considered and passed on the 14th day of December last, the whole subject being then for the second time discussed by the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, the bill which was passed by the Senate in December did not relate to the public lands. As the Senator from Montana pointed out in his very lucid statement a few moments ago, no bill relating to the public lands has been passed. One has been considered in a previous Congress. None has been considered by the Senate at this session.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The statement of the Senator is quite true, and yet the fact is that the controverted questions in the two measures are practically the same.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that there is a great deal of difference between a bill which deals with navigable streams and a bill which deals with the streams within the public-land States. I am sure that in the very brief discussion which occurred in the Senate during this session with respect to the bill which passed the Senate very little, if any, consideration was given to the question of the public lands or how this bill would affect the public lands.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will find on examination of the bill passed by the Senate and the amendment proposed by the House that the material difference relates to the leasing of public lands for dam sites and for transmission lines over the public lands, and that practically every other principle involved in both of the bills applies to streams upon the public lands equally with those of navigable waters. I undertook to make that statement a while ago, showing that the interest of the Public Lands Committee is really very much smaller than that of the Commerce Committee in regard to the jurisdiction of this bill.

Mr. KING. With respect to the relative interest which these two committees would have in this bill I express no opinion. I do not know whether it is more important to the Commerce Committee than it is to the Public Lands Committee. There is very much in what the Senator from Iowa suggested, that it is of immense importance to the Interstate Commerce Committee. But the point I am trying to make is that there has been attached to the Senate bill a measure which was not considered in the Senate, and there are features of this important subject to which Senators have not given attention. Now, to submit this whole matter to a conference committee seems to me to be manifestly unfair. I think we ought to have an opportunity to consider it upon the floor of the Senate, have an opportunity to amend the provisions of the bill, and for that reason it ought first to go to a special committee constituted in the manner indicated by the Senator from Iowa, and let them report such a bill as their judgment and the investigations which they may made demand.

When they report a measure to the Senate it can then go to the calendar, and when it is called up for consideration it can receive proper attention at the hands of Senators and the subject can be dealt with in a full and comprehensive manner.

I shall vote against the motion to refer the bill to conference, and shall most cordially and heartily support the position of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I do not know whether I find myself in agreement with either side in this controversy. I am convinced, without going into a discussion of the broad question, that the Federal Government has no right or jurisdiction over any navigable or nonnavigable stream further than a mere easement for the transportation of commerce. The Supreme Court has decided from the first—I can not speak of its later decisions—that it was a mere easement. The Federal Government has no right or power to charge the individual who puts up the money for a purpose that does not injure commerce, that, in fact, nineteen times out of twenty improves the commerce of the stream. The Federal Government, except for the few purposes of the maintenance of that commerce, has no right on earth to say a word to a State about what it does with that water. When it comes to the nonnavigable streams within a State, whether on public land or in privately owned areas, the Government has no right of control over the stream or the use or the disposal of the water except for purposes purely governmental.

In the desert-land States the law and the constitutions of the States declare that the waters belong to the people of the States. The Federal Government owns the land on these streams as any other proprietor would own it, modified probably by the trust that many of the Supreme Court decisions place on the character and purpose and extent of the Government title. But grant that the Government is the proprietor, it can not hold as a sovereign, as has been decided time and time again by the Supreme Court. Any private owner of land abutting on a stream in any of the desert-land States can be forced by eminent domain, through proceedings in the State court, to submit his land to any easement for any beneficial purpose named in the statute of the State.

Yet the Federal Government makes reservations invading the sovereignty of the State simply by declaring that the Government owns the land of the waters of the State, and neither the State nor any individual shall without its consent use the water on which the life of the State depends. Thus all water-power development is suppressed.

I agree with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] that the questions of navigable and nonnavigable waters in some respects are wide apart, but at the very bottom of them they rest on the same principle, that in fact the Government has nothing to do with the one except to preserve the navigation of the stream, and it is acting as a dog in the manger when it says to a man on the Tennessee or on the Ohio River that he can not build a dam across it, confessedly not injuring but aiding navigation, and that the man who built it or the State that did it, shall not have the right to say what should be done with the power incident to the expenditure of the money.

I do not agree with the leasing system. In my State alone, I think I am within reasonable limits when I say that there have been propositions by which we could have lighted the city of Los Angeles from private capital, willing to deliver the power generated at a fixed and a reasonable price, willing to submit to the domination of the State as to what a reasonable and fair price would be; but they will not put up a dollar—and I think they would be very foolish if they did—when they are subject to leases drawn and interpreted by Secretaries of the Interior, whose personnel is often changing. I do not know but that, as my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said the other day, the Navy might take jurisdiction and the Attorney General have much to say before the lease expired. They do not know where they are. Under such circumstances they would not put up the money for a development of the stream, and it will not be done in the next 50 years under the Government reservation of power sites in a desert-land State.

We might as well come to a realization of that fact at one time as another. Let the Government go to the full length that the Supreme Court will permit rather than submit to the proposition as to my State, with its rights and powers under its constitution, and the Federal Constitution shall be ignored by Federal invasion usurping the State sovereignty and renting State property and keeping to itself the money exacted from its victims. Riparian rights have no existence in desert countries. Our laws dedicate waters to very different ends than those recognized as rights of landowners along streams in England and the well-watered States east of the great mountains dividing our country.

Mr. President, if this conference committee is confined simply to these two measures and does not violate the rule of the House and the Senate, if the conferees do not give relief from these positions by a finding outside of either bill to make it perfectly plain, in violation of the very rules of sensible conferees—sensible I mean of the conditions of the country—before taking the navigable streams on the one part or the nonnavigable streams on the other, and if out of that conference there can not be some reasonable measure reported to the Senate, then I shall despair of ever getting relief and must take, as we all have to take in this life, some doses that are very unpleasant for us, no matter how much they hope or promise to improve our health. That conference committee, in my judgment, ought to make a broad division, whether either of these bills do it or not, between the navigable and nonnavigable streams. The navigable streams are not bothering me, except one named as navigable that a boat bearing commerce has not been on in 20 years, and that is the Colorado River. We can light every city within 150 miles, giving power and light, from the Colorado River by private enterprise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. This question comes to my mind at that point. I hold exactly the same opinion with regard to the rights of the Federal Government and the interest in these streams, so far as the water is concerned, that the Senator from Arizona holds; but now the House has passed a bill and sent it over here which provides that the commissioners in whose jurisdiction this whole matter is placed may make such an annual charge for the use of the water in your nonnavigable stream as they may see fit. We have passed nothing on that subject.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope we never will pass anything to that effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have had no opportunity to express ourselves in any way upon it. Now, what will be in conference between the House and the Senate when you send a bill so framed to conference?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As far as I am concerned, in answering as well as I can the Senator's question, no such agreement ought ever to be had in that conference. Here is our trouble, as already stated: There is no legislation at all to give this conference committee, if you will hold yourself strictly within the rule by saying nothing shall be considered except one or the other bill contemplated. We have found there is no possibility of agreement, not because the Senate was not willing to go much further than it ought to go, in my judgment, but because the Senate, making all the concessions it could, is met every time with that unbending determination of the House conferees. If the Senator's motion to refer prevails and the committee reports and the Senate passes a bill meeting our judgment, that measure would have in conference the same trouble we are having now. It will delay without giving aid.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that Congress has not anything in the world to do with the development of water power on nonnavigable streams.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that. That is what I am talking about. But it is assuming power.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is nothing in the bill——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is assuming power under this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; only in so far as nonnavigable streams run through public lands.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They are on the public lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. That may be somewhere, but in some States there are no public lands——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am talking about the arid States west of the Rocky Mountains. There are the public lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. This refers only to navigable water, and Congress has jurisdiction over navigable water.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What jurisdiction?

Mr. FLETCHER. Control for the purposes of navigation. For that reason Congress says you can not interfere with one of these navigable streams by building a dam across it without our permission. It is to meet a condition like that that this legislation is necessary. With respect to nonnavigable streams Congress has nothing to do; the Federal Government has nothing to do, except in so far as the bill attempts to reach in the use of the language "or" upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States, including the Territories.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That takes in every nonnavigable stream west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, there is where the authority rests in Congress to enact this sort of legislation and to that extent it was within our jurisdiction, but speaking generally of the exercise of power over nonnavigable streams, we have no power of that sort.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am sorry the Senator has not had the experience the balance of us have. The Senator does not know about what has been done in regard to nonnavigable streams in our State.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's [Mr. FLETCHER'S] position is correct in the abstract.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. THOMAS. But in practice authority is now exercised by the Secretary of War over every tributary of every navigable stream upon the theory that interference with the tributary, whether navigable or not, may interfere with or disturb the flow of the stream which is navigable. As a consequence, this bill will be made applicable, if it passes, to every tributary of every navigable stream in the section of the country for which the Senator from Arizona now speaks. That has been carried to such an extent that the attempted diversion of water from a small tributary of the Colorado River in my State necessitated the interviewing by my colleague and myself of the Secretaries of the Interior, Agriculture, War, and State before we could secure final action.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado for his illuminating interruption. Let me add one word to it. As I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in charge of a finance measure, is very anxious to pass it this evening, I shall not detain the Senate further than to say that not only streams that go into navigable waters are controlled by the Federal Government, but streams that waste and burrow in the desert sands and never see a navigable stream are likewise to be controlled and managed by Federal authority, the States meanwhile protesting.

When an opportunity is discovered to build a dam in a mountain canyon to generate power to pump water on farms below the Government at once reserves this as a power site and development ceases. Of course it does. Under such conditions it could not be otherwise. I leave to your imagination the blight this throws over the whole State where every feasible power site is reserved from use by the people of the State and from the State itself.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would just like to ask the Senator if there are no navigable streams in the West on public lands and what happens when the public land is homesteaded?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. None in my State, and I know of few, if any, in any arid State. The lands selected for power sites are always and of necessity impossible to settle as a homestead. Homesteads might and would be made on lands below the power site if the homeseekers could develop power and by it pump water on the adjacent valley lands.

Mr. HARDWICK. You mean if the Government takes the water they never can use the land?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I mean that the Government reserves the power site, does nothing to develop it, and by the reservation prevents anybody else from developing or using it. Thus you see no one can use the power or develop it for any purpose whatever. It prevents anybody from using the water power, though it is dedicated to the State under the constitution of the State.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the pending question, the amendment offered by my colleague to the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] relates to the powers and privileges of the Committee on Public Lands, of which I have the honor to be chairman, and inasmuch as the amendment of my colleague would confer certain powers and responsibilities upon the chairman of that committee, to which reference has been made in the debate this afternoon, I feel that I should say at least enough on the pending question to explain my vote thereon, and that I will do.

I have not been oblivious to the situation that has confronted the Senate with regard to the substitute water-power bill which has been sent to the Senate by the House. I have given it much thought and have conferred with various Senators in regard thereto and as to the proper procedure and what should be done. It is a very unusual situation. The Senate has passed a bill for the development of water power on the navigable streams of the country, but has never passed a bill for the development of water power on unnavigable streams on the public domain of the country. Heretofore those subjects have been treated separately by the Senate. A bill for the development of water power on navigable streams has twice passed the Senate. A bill for the development of water power on unnavigable streams on the public domain has been debated but has never passed the Senate.

When the bill for the development of water power on the navigable streams of the country went to the House a special committee was appointed, and it reported a substitute which covers and embraces legislation on the entire subject, comprising the development of water power on the navigable streams of the country and the development of water power on the unnavigable streams of the country on the public domain. Bills for the development of water power on the navigable streams of the country have always been reported out of committee and handled in the Senate by the Senate Committee on Commerce. Bills for the development of water power on unnavigable streams on the public domain have always been reported and handled in the Senate by the Senate Committee on Public Lands. So we get back here from the House an omnibus bill, a bill combining legislation of both kinds which has heretofore had a divided jurisdiction in the Senate.

Of course, the bill for which this substitute comes back from the House was reported out of and handled on the floor of the Senate by the Senate Committee on Commerce. It has always been the practice in the Senate for the Senate conferees, when a bill goes to conference, to be selected from the committee which has handled the bill in the Senate or which handled the bill for which a substitute comes from the House. So on the face of the situation the Public Lands Committee was apparently cut out of all jurisdiction. Jurisdiction was apparently taken out from under it.

It is an unparalleled situation. In my experience of seven years and a half as a Member of this body I have never known another such situation to arise. So far as I know it has no precedent, and I do not believe that it has one. It is somewhat of a puzzling question as to what should be done with the substitute bill which has come to the Senate and if it should go to conference how the conferees should be selected. I admit that it was quite perplexing to me, and I have not been oblivious to the importance of it and the responsibility connected with it, and I have given it much thought. I have conferred with different Senators serving on different committees about the situation and as to what ought to be done.

Primarily, on the face of the situation the Committee on Commerce appears to have the first claim to jurisdiction and recognition in the selection of conferees. However, as is apparent to everybody, the Committee on Public Lands is equally interested, and, as my colleague has said, the public-land States afford the opportunity for the major portion of the development of water power in this country.

After conferring with members of the Commerce Committee it was stated to me by one Senator on that committee that if the bill should go to conference the Committee on Commerce was willing to allow two of five Senate conferees to come from the Committee on Public Lands. Speaking for myself, I was disposed to accept the proposition as the best that could be hoped for. In my experience here conferees on the part of the Senate have always consisted of an odd number. I have never known an even number to be appointed on behalf of either the Senate or the House. The immemorial rule has been an odd number—generally three or five. I have never known less than three and I have never known more than five conferees on the part of the Senate, and I supposed the conference would undoubtedly consist of an odd number and would probably be five.

That being the case I felt that I could hardly hope for the Public Lands Committee to get three out of five conferees, when the bill for which the substitute comes back from the House was a bill which originally came from the Senate Commerce Committee. I thought I could not possibly expect the Public Lands Committee to get three conferees and the Commerce Committee to get only two under those circumstances. It appeared to me that two from the Public Lands Committee out of five would be all that could be hoped for or expected.

I can see reasons for the uniform practice of conferees from the Senate consisting of an odd number, because the rule is that when conferees from the House and the Senate get together they do not vote each one for himself and let the majority of all settle a disputed question. The rule is that a majority of the conferees of each branch of Congress must decide what that branch will stand for and whether it will accept or reject a proposition; whether they will sign or refuse to sign the conference report; whether they will abide by or refuse to abide by any action. So always heretofore conferees on the part of the Senate have consisted of three or five; so a majority of them could decide the attitude of the Senate in the conference. There is reason for this. The great obstacle in conferences is the danger of deadlock between Senate and House conferees. Some conferences are wholly fruitless on that account—result in permanent deadlocks and permanently defeat legislation. Many times legislation, if not defeated, is delayed weeks or months. To have Senate or House conferees of even number, four or six, might result in deadlocking the conferees for one branch among themselves, two or three on each side of a question. That would increase the danger of a deadlock and no legislation. Hence, I have never known House or Senate conferees to consist of an even number.

However, of course I shall vote for and support the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. WALSH] to make the conference consist of six members, three each from the Public Lands and the Commerce Committees. It is at once apparent that that is more equitable and fair, as giving to each committee an equal voice in the proceedings of the conference. It is not only fairer but better for the Public Lands Committee and for the Western States, the interests of which that committee is supposed particularly to represent. Upon reflection, I do not know either that an even number of conferees from the Senate would make it any more awkward in settling questions before the conference; upon reflection I have come to the conclusion that it would not make it any more awkward. The Senate conferees would have to be bound by a vote of four out of six instead of a vote of three out of five.

The old rule that the majority must prevail would remain. Of course, I can not consistently vote against any proposition which is intended to give the Committee on Public Lands equal dignity and standing, equal weight and representation in the consideration of matters wherein it is equally interested with another committee. For that reason I shall vote for the amendment offered by my colleague. I think that the best solution of a vexed question, one which has been the subject of much conference and discussion between members of the Public Lands and Commerce Commitees of the Senate and other Senators, as well. I regard it as a very happy solution. It is a departure from custom, but this is an unprecedented condition and must be settled regardless of precedents, for there are none.

As to the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the bill should be sent to a special committee for further consideration and then for report to the Senate, I must say that I share with my colleague the fear that that would result in interminable delay, in nothing being done at this session of Congress, and probably nothing being done during the life of this Congress, which must expire on the 4th of March next. I realize that there is much merit in the suggestion offered by the Senator from Iowa; there is some reason in support of it; but I have had such long experience, covering a number of years of fruitless effort, in the endeavor to get through this body legislation for the development of water power on nonnavigable streams on the public lands of the country, in order to develop the resources of the Western States and to advance their interests, that I shrink from anything which offers further opportunity for delay. Delay is so easy to occur in this body, and it intervenes often on such slight provocation and is likely to be so prolonged, that I feel that my past experience with legislation of this character in this body justifies me in saying that the course suggested by the Senator from Iowa would greatly endanger and jeopardize the possibility of any water-power legislation during the life of this Congress if this bill should go to either a regular or a special committee for further consideration. Therefore, I shall vote for the motion to send the bill to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. I call for a division.

Mr. THOMAS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to know whether the motion of the Senator from Montana is that six conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President, three of whom shall be members of the Committee on Commerce and three of whom shall be members of the Committee on Public Lands. Is that the motion?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, that is not the main question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; that is not the main question.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not for the Senate first to determine whether or not it will send the bill to conference?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not so think. The original motion was that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to Senate bill 1419, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I see. This motion is in the nature of an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the original motion. The question has been ordered divided, and the question will therefore be put in this shape.

Mr. LODGE. I see. I did not know that the motion of the Senator from Montana was in the nature of an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, on account of illness in his family. During his absence I have a pair with him on this and other matters. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], which I transfer to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. As he is not in the Chamber, and I do not know how he would vote upon this measure if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and will allow my vote to stand. This notice may stand for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who, I observe, is absent. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Brandegee	Kenyon	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	King	Nugent	Thomas
Cummins	Lewis	Phelan	Thompson
Curtis	Lodge	Pomerene	Vardaman

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendment's, the first question is, Will the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to Senate bill 1419?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the first question whether the Senate shall disagree and ask for a conference?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant was not in the chair at the time, but his understanding is that the Senator from Iowa asked that the question be divided as the Chair has indicated, and that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who was then in the chair, ruled that he was entitled to have it so divided.

Mr. CUMMINS. The then occupant of the chair must have misunderstood me. I suggested that there should be a division, first, as to whether we shall send the bill to conference—that is, as to whether we shall disagree and ask the House for a conference; and, second, as to the manner of appointing the conferees if the first question should be decided in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time, but was informed that the Senator had asked to have the question divided into three parts.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President. Of course I want the Senate to disagree to the action of the House; my whole argument has been to show that there ought to be a disagreement; but I have attempted to show that, instead of asking for a conference and appointing conferees, we should amend the bill on the floor of the Senate or send it to a committee, either general or special, for the purpose of having it considered there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. If we vote down the motion to disagree, then the bill is before us to make such disposition as we please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had supposed that the request of the House for a conference was a necessary part of the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair present this question: If the Senate votes down the motion to disagree and decides that it will have no conference, has it not passed the bill? That is what the Chair would rule, whether he is overruled or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we vote down the motion to disagree and the request for a conference?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. That will pass the bill, as the Senate does not disagree and does not want a conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Chair hold that would pass the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Why not?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was, therefore, that I moved early in the debate that the bill be referred to a special committee, to be composed of five members of the Committee on Commerce and five members of the Committee on Public Lands, for consideration and report. I understood the Chair at that time to rule that that motion was not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion was not in order, but if the pending motion as a whole should be voted down by the Senate the Chair would then rule that the Senate could refer the bill to a special committee or a standing committee, or that the Senate could amend it in the Senate. When, however, the motion is split up and the Senate votes alone on the question as to whether it will disagree or will not disagree, that presents a different situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. That being true, I withdraw the request for a division of the question and ask that the motion as amended be voted down.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senate bill having been amended in the House, then, if the request for a conference is denied, the question will be on concurring in the House amendment, will it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request has been made to divide the question and have a separate vote on whether the Senate will disagree to the House amendment. The Chair says that if that is voted down, it is an agreement to the House amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, with all submission, I do not think that is ever the method of agreement. The first motion in order when a Senate bill is returned from the House with an amendment is to concur, because that brings the Houses immediately together. The next is a motion to disagree and ask for a conference. The next is to disagree and ask for a conference with instructions. I do not think the mere voting down of a motion to disagree in the least is equal to an agreement by definite affirmations, because if we voted down a motion to disagree, the matter is still before the Senate, and we have got to have an affirmative motion to concur or agree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair simply wanted to warn the Senate as to how he was going to rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. At any rate, the whole question can be settled on the vote on the motion to disagree to the House amendment and ask for a conference. All those have to do who insist that the procedure ought to be otherwise and that they want the bill to go to a committee is to vote against the motion, while those who want it to go to conference should vote for the motion, and that will settle it. There is no need of any division of the question at all.

Mr. THOMAS. That is not the ruling of the Vice President.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the ruling of the Chair, namely, that if this motion is voted down the bill is still before the Senate and can be referred to a special committee or can be amended here. That is what the Chair holds, and that is exactly the situation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will not the situation be this: If this motion is voted down then the House amendment to the Senate bill will be before the Senate for such disposition as the Senate may wish to make of it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly; and that is what the Chair has held when a vote is taken on the whole motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair ruled the other day; but if the Senate wants to split this question up and vote down the first half of the motion, the ruling of the Chair will be that that passes the bill, and there will be an opportunity to overrule the Chair; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the vote was to be taken on the whole motion as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that question is voted down there is not any doubt about the right of the Senate then to proceed to take up the bill in the Senate or refer it to a standing or special committee.

Mr. LODGE. If voting down a motion to disagree is equivalent to voting to concur, there never would be an opportunity for the Senate to amend or to refer to a committee. We could either concur or could vote down a motion to disagree, and thereby concur.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not ask for that kind of a division of the question, and I now withdraw my request for a division.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I renew the request.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wish to remind the Senate that, if it desires an opportunity to amend this bill or to consider the bill that has been sent here by the House, the motion made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] ought to be voted down.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I renew the request for a division of the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For a separate vote?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington now renews the request for a separate vote on the different clauses of this question. On what part does the Senator wish a vote first?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have, first, submitted to the Senate the motion to disagree. If that is voted down, I understand, under the ruling of the Chair, it is equivalent to concurring in the amendment of the House, and that is what I desire. I believe that this legislation ought to be disposed of and that the best measure that we can get out of the controversies which have been raging here for a number of years is the House bill; and, in order to submit that question, under the ruling of the Chair, I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, if he will make a motion to concur in the House amendment, it will accomplish his purpose without any ruling of the Chair, or there being any doubt about it. Such a motion will take precedence over the pending question, and will bring the matter to a direct vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to making that motion. Under the ruling announced by the Chair, the first procedure would be equivalent to that; but if it is in order, I make the motion that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington moves that the Senate concur in the House amendment. That motion being calculated to bring the two Houses together, is in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I note the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair. I therefore transfer my pair with him to my colleague [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). While, as I have heretofore announced, I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I am informed by his colleague that on this motion he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as on the last roll call, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMPSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who, I observe, is not present. I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last roll call, to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 48, as follows:

So Mr. POINDEXTER's motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to Senate bill 1419, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and—as amended—that six conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President, three of whom shall be members of the Committee on Commerce and three members of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, at the risk of calling for a repetition, because I want it thoroughly understood, I make a parliamentary inquiry: If that motion is voted down, the bill will then be before the Senate for such disposition as it shall see fit to make of it, will it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The House amendment will be before the Senate, either for amendment on the floor of the Senate or for reference to the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Public Lands, or any other committee, or a special committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say a few words with reference to this matter, because in order to make this bill workable I believe it is necessary that amendments should be made. In order to permit amendments it is contended that the conference report must be referred to a special committee instead of a conference committee.

I do not believe it is possible to raise big sums of money for the purpose of constructing reservoirs and water-power plants upon the public domain unless an applicant gets a title upon which a financier will lend money; and in this bill, as it is now reported, there is no such title. The title reported is a leasehold estate which is subject to forfeiture for many causes. It is absurd to expect capitalists to lend large sums of money upon security that might be wiped out without any fault on their part. It seems to me, therefore, that it becomes necessary to amend the bill. It can be done very easily by leaving the law as it was before the withdrawals of water-power sites took place and before the passage of the law making all rights of way simply revokable permits. In that event the public is protected by utility commissions in States fixing rates, as water-power plants or common carriers. It may also be done by making it in the alternative, as to whether a person can file upon the site under the old law or under the leasing system. It may also be done by giving the Federal Power Commission power to permit entries for power sites under the old law in the event that it is not able to get any person or company to undertake the construction of reservoirs under the leasing system of this bill. It must be remembered that it takes from $5,000,000 to $40,000,000 to construct one of these water-power plants and the money is always raised by bonds secured by mortgage upon the plant. My theory is that where you have a bill which provides for leasing, with the power on the part of the Government to absolutely annul the whole grant and to forfeit the rights of the entryman, you can not get capitalists to lend money upon any such title. It seems to me that even if we affirm this portion of the bill there ought to be a provision by which a stronger title can be granted, with a recapture clause attached for the benefit of any municipality, or the State, or the Nation. With such amendments water-power plants would be constructed and the public protected from monopoly.

It seems to me, therefore, that this bill ought to be sent to a committee, not of conference but a committee of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as on the last roll call, and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the former roll call as to my pair and its transfer, and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As before announced, I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; but I am informed by his colleague that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote on this motion. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last roll call and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Upon this question I am at liberty to vote, although my pair is absent. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the preceding roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I transfer that pair so that he may stand paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Making the same transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 9, as follows:

So Mr. FLETCHER's motion, as amended, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

BOND EXEMPTION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SIMMONS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. First Lieut. Charles W. Cairnes to be a captain on the retired list.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 23, 1918.

The House met at 11.15 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Eternal Spirit, God over all, without whom we could not be, inspire us with the highest and holiest aspirations, that our work may be of the highest excellence and worthy of all emulation. To the glory of Thy holy name, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gen. SHERWOOD requests leave of absence for 10 days on account of looking over the political situation in his district.

[Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that that be granted, because of its candor.

The leave of absence was granted.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. To make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the further consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 429.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a copy of a resolution or report adopted or made by the agricultural advisory committee touching the price of wheat on or about the 20th day of August, 1918.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a copy of a report or recommendation made by the Secretary of Agriculture to the President of the United States touching the price of wheat on or about the 24th day of August, 1918.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman claim that the resolution is privileged?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is a resolution of inquiry referred to the Committee on Agriculture on the 9th day of September, 1918. Under the rule the resolution was required to be reported within seven days thereafter. Not having been so reported, the motion to discharge the committee is a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota, although his resolution is passed, to the fact that the language of his resolution, it seems to me, is faulty. He uses the words "Resolved further." That is never used in a resolution. The resolution is all one resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. But there are two distinct propositions in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is right, and, without objection, the words "Resolved further" will be stricken out.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The special order for to-day is the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has 30 minutes, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] 15 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the gentleman from West Virginia, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may now address the House under the order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the program be turned upside down and that the gentleman from Illinois, who was last, may now be first. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEFERRED CLASSIFICATION IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago the House passed 14 resolutions calling on the different departments and boards and commissions to report the number of men who had received deferred classification at the request of the heads of those boards or departments. All of the departments thus far, except the Post Office Department and the War Department, have reported the names and addresses and positions occupied by those men and how long they have been in the service.

I do not know why the War Department and the Post Office Department have not paid any attention to the resolutions passed by the House. It may be that they, having men employed all over the United States, find difficulty in assembling the information which they expect to send to the House.

I was gratified when the report of the Navy Department came in to find that the Secretary of the Navy was responsive to the sentiments which the House expressed through the resolutions, in that he indicated that, notwithstanding the fact that a great many men within the draft age had been deferred and were occupied in clerical places in the Navy Department, he expected to put them into active service as rapidly as the conditions in his department would permit. Whether any such action has been taken by any other branch of the service I do not know.

The marvel of the assembling of the Army has been the manner in which the Provost Marshal General's Department has been operated. His task was an onerous task. It required a great deal of careful calculation to formulate the rules and regulations by means of which this great Army and Navy were gathered together from the body of the citizenry of the country. How well his work has been done everybody in the United States realizes. I think no man ever occupied a public place who has performed his functions as disinterestedly or as systematically as has the Provost Marshal General of the Army. He is to be commended not only by the Congress but by the people of the country as well. I believe he has the confidence of the American people to a greater extent than any other man, unless it be the President, and he deserves that confidence.

In order that he may be able successfully to continue the work with which he is charged it will be necessary for him to have the cooperation of all departments of the Government, civil as well as military. Unless he has that cooperation the work that he has so well performed up to the present time is likely, in a large measure, to be destroyed. It would be unfortunate if any civil department of the Government should be permitted to intervene in any way to embarrass the organization of the Army and the Navy, or to create dissatisfaction among the American people by giving deferred classification to men who ought to be in uniform at the front.

The object of my statement here this morning is to call the attention of the House to a telegram which was sent out by Herbert Hoover, Food Administrator, on the 19th of this month, which, from the language of the telegram, was intended to be secret, and which, if followed by action, such as he suggested, will be the cause of great embarrassment and some uneasiness as well as great dissatisfaction among the people of the country. I read the telegram for the information of the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19, 1918.

To all food administrators and zone agents:

With regard to the selective draft, wish to repeat that the attitude of the Government is that every man who is essential to the efficient conduct of your administration should be retained in your organization, and that it will be easier from a working point of view if such men as you select would claim deferred classification by reason of their connection with the Food Administration. These claims must be supported by affidavits, which you should obtain from local board and sign and forward for my approval. As affidavit must be returned to local board you must arrange for extension of time for filing questionnaire and affidavit in case of every essential man. These affidavits will be practically final with the exemption boards, and if not recognized by them, the whole of their action will be reviewed from Washington. Registrants may claim deferred classification by reason of dependent families or other ground at the same time. If any of the men you designate have conscientious objections to making this claim for deferred classification on their own account they may omit to make any such claim and you can make claim for them, sending affidavit for our approval and obtaining extension of time as above. All of the men who are deferred in order that they may continue in the Food Administration, including those who claim deferred classification at your suggestion and those receiving it through our intervention, will receive from us, on authority of the President, a statement that they have been directed by the Government to continue in the Food Administration.

We wish you to interpret the definition of "essential men," for whom deferred classification is provided, with sufficient liberality to maintain the efficiency of the Food Administration, but where men can be replaced without in any way damaging the efficiency of the organization, deferred classification should not be claimed. Give no publicity regarding this matter. If you are yourself within the draft age, advise at once, stating your age and number and address of local board having jurisdiction, as I intend to secure exemption for you under direction of the President, that you are performing the maximum service in your present position.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand that that communication which the gentleman has just read is a telegram?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Probably a night letter.

Mr. MADDEN. A night letter is a telegram, is it not?

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. Just let us stop to think for a moment of the extraordinary language of this telegram. Where men have conscientious objection, it says, to making a claim for deferred classification, the agents under whom the men are employed are directed to make the claim for them; and the telegram further states that if the local boards refuse to take cognizance of the affidavits filed, whether filed by the man who receives deferred classification or by the man under whom he works, the whole of the action of the local board is to be reviewed in Washington. This is extraordinary. If a civilian officer of the Government or an agent is permitted to conduct the affairs of the office that he holds in defiance of all the rules laid down by the President himself, we may hope in the not distant future to see chaos in an effort to organize an army. We have already boasted, and justly boasted, that we have been the most successful of any country in the world in an effort to organize an army from civilians. We already have in the Army and the Navy something like 3,000,000 men in uniform. But if the agents of the Government outside of the Army are permitted to go over the heads of the Army and the properly constituted authorities and direct who shall serve in the Army and who shall not, who can blame the people of the United States if they hesitate? This telegram is extraordinary. It says, "Make no publicity of this matter." It says also that men are to be deferred not only on the recommendation of the agents of the Food Administrator, but of the Food Administrator himself, regardless of whether these men want to serve in the Army or not. It can not be construed as anything less than outrageous. Why should we have a draft law? The purpose of the draft law was to raise an army, to be sure that we were going to be able to raise an army. All of the men in Congress who voted against the volunteer system of raising an army did so because they were fearful that we might sometime have a lot of men on the front facing the enemy and that we would have nobody behind to come to their relief in case of danger. The purpose of passing the draft law was to make certain that we had a sufficient number of soldiers in reserve to come to the relief of the men who were on the front line. We were fearful that if we depended upon the volunteer system we would find ourselves short of reserves at the most critical period of the war. If the reserves are to be dissipated by orders from men who have no responsibility whatever for the conduct of the war, we ought to know about it. We ought to know whether the laws of the land are to be obeyed or whether they are to be set aside with impunity. We ought to know whether the Provost Marshal General of the Army has responsibility for the proper conduct of his office or whether some man in some administrative position outside of the Army has superior authority, and whether that superior authority can be exercised without respect to what effect it may have on the discipline of the Army and upon the sentiment of the people of the country.

So far the people of the United States have been willing and ready and anxious to do all they can to promote the country's welfare. They have been willing to give every dollar and every man, and I believe that no Government functionary should be permitted to in any way embarrass the situation. I further believe that if the telegram that I have read should be acted upon favorably by the men in charge of the Food Administration throughout the country and deferred classification be given to men who were even not willing to ask for it, it would be a great calamity. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. This telegram, I understand, was sent to the various members of the Food Administration?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; throughout the country.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Permit me to ask one more question. I voted for the selective-draft law, and I think the gentleman did. Was it not urged upon the floor of the House that it would permit the men best able to serve at home to be left at home, and those best able to go might be taken?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but this does not do that.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Are not these men who have already had experience in the administration of the food laws better prepared and better able to discharge their duties than new men would be?

Mr. MADDEN. I apprehend that a great many men who are in the Food Administration are not needed there, for I do not know of any department of the Government where there are so many people employed who do nothing except sit around and draw their pay.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. I am almost inclined to agree with the gentleman upon that, but in his telegram he advises these people not to ask exemption.

Mr. MADDEN. He says they must construe the word "essential" liberally, and that means that they can construe it in any way they please.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Permit me to ask one more question, if it does not embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, it does not embarrass me. Nothing embarrasses me.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. The gentleman objects to the statement in the letter that the matter will be reviewed from Washington.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Is not there a regular channel through which these reviews shall come?

Mr. MADDEN. No; the regulations of the draft made by the President himself provide—of course, they make the President violate his own regulations under the telegram, but here is what the regulations say:

Classification from which an appeal may be claimed: Such appeals may be claimed only by or in respect of a registrant classified by a district board in class 1 or by or in respect of a registrant classified by a district board in a deferred class, when and after the immediately preceding class is exhausted; and only when there has been at least one dissenting vote in the district board.

Now, the President made the regulations that under no circumstances would they review a case except where there was at least one dissenting vote in the district board; but this telegram instructs these agents to disregard all the regulations and instructs them that where the local board refuses to act upon the affidavits made that the case will be reviewed in Washington.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. The gentleman will admit that is the construction the gentleman places on this rather than what is implied?

Mr. MADDEN. I am reading the regulations, and then I am reading a telegram, and then I am taking the two together. I do not want to be unfair, but I want to call the matter to the attention of the House and the country, because I think it is worthy of being given publicity. I think it is one of the greatest mistakes an administrative officer can make to send such a message to his agents throughout the country and ask them to keep it secret. Now, why should there be any secrecy if it is the proper thing to do? If it is not a proper thing to do it ought not to be done regardless of whether it is secret or public.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. The gentleman will understand I am not speaking of Mr. Hoover, because he does not need the defense——

Mr. MADDEN. I am not trying to berate Mr. Hoover.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. But he might have thought that the language if made public—that many men would bring pressure to bear who should not have exemption?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, that might have been his object, but I am bringing this to the attention of the public for Mr. Hoover, so that I may be sure the public understands it. I have nothing but the greatest admiration for Mr. Hoover as a man. I think he is a man of great ability, and I think he has done wonderful work. I think that he is worthy of the confidence of the country, and I do not know of any man with whom I have had conversation who impressed me with better knowledge of the work that he has in charge than Mr. Hoover has, but that could not make me agree that this performance is one that he can justify. I will say about his office that there are more people employed in the office—I will not say employed because that would not be fair—but people who are sitting around the office——

Mr. CALDWELL. Drawing pay?

Mr. MADDEN. On the pay roll, which gives them a chance of drawing money out of the Treasury and giving no value for the compensation they receive, than in any other place I know. You can walk through the office of the Food Administration, as I have done for an hour and a half one day, and you would have seen at least a thousand people supposed to be employed as clerks, groups of stenographers in three or four different rooms, maybe as many as 5, maybe 10, in a group, with not a typewriter at work in any room, with no person employed, sitting around reading a newspaper or gossiping; and that is not the only department where that is true—I walked through the Engineering Division one day, started in at 9 o'clock and walked through from 9 until half past 10, just as a matter of curiosity, did not speak to anybody, went through the office. I saw at least a thousand people in the hour and a half and there was not one in the whole thousand working during the hour and a half.

I saw there groups of stenographers, five groups, not less than 50 in all, and not one typewriting machine at work out of the whole 50, not anybody at a desk doing a thing. Now, if they were doing that during that hour and a half, how many other hours and a half might that same thing be true? You will find that all through the departments, and yet we are spending millions of dollars here for housing which is unnecessary. There is no need for spending this money if the departments will confine themselves to the number of people that they can legitimately employ. There are ten people doing one person's work in most places. I know a case where, for example, a major in one of the branches of the War Department having charge of personnel work, anxious to employ and get commissions for two or three more majors, succeeded in convincing the head of the department that the work of his branch of the service was so arduous that he was compelled, as a matter of justice to the department, to get more officers. He got them, and not one of those men has done a bit of work since commissioned. Not only that, but the men previously in the offices have not been doing anything, they say so themselves, and they are ashamed of being there. Why, over in New York I went through the quartermasters stores, and I was able to get the names of 210 commissioned officers in that office from majors down. There was one desk in the place for every three men. They had to relay, in order to get a desk once in a while, and when they were not relaying they acted as messenger boys or smoked cigarettes. There is just room for a proper organization in that office for 20 division directors. It might be proper that each of those should be a commissioned officer, but all the other people in the office ought to be girls or young men below the draft age or men above the draft age who ought not to be in the Army, but those men, with five or six exceptions, are within the draft age. I got the name and rank and house address and the telephone number of every one of those men, and called the case to the attention of the Quartermaster General.

The work they were doing was done before the war by civilians—men and women. After the war began it was done by uniformed officers drawing high pay. And so it goes. In this connection I call attention to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with 10,000 employees where half that number should suffice.

Now, contrast, for example, the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the Navy with the Quartermasters Department of the Army. The Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the Navy provides for 560,000 men and all the ships. It buys and supplies, it keeps the accounts, and pays the men. They have eight men in the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—men and women—to do all the work of coaling the ships of the Navy. For a similar function in the Army they would have 2,000 men. They have, for example, in all of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts about 1,600 men and women. They buy all the cannon for the ships, let all the contracts, keep all the accounts, pay all the men, do everything that is to be done in connection with the supplies.

While the Fuel Administration has over 1,200 people right here in Washington, compare their work with the work of the Supplies and Accounts Division of the Navy and you can understand how idiotic it would be for anybody to suppose that 1,200 people are necessary in the Fuel Administration of this Government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DECKER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent both to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, war, with its innumerable hardships, immeasurable burdens, and indescribable horrors is never a subject for pleasurable contemplation. Our natural inclination is to think and speak of the triumphs and treasures of peace rather than the havoc and anguish of war. But to escape consideration and constant consideration of the war in which we are now engaged is a task as difficult of performance as was that of the vestal virgin who, in order to prove her innocence, was required to carry water in a sieve from the banks of the Tiber to the top of the Capitoline Hill.

The American people have never reveled in bloodshed, gloried in slaughter, or delighted in the images of camps and sieges and battles. They have found the wellsprings of their being and the gratification of their ambition in felling the forests and subduing the forces of nature; in sowing in springtime and reaping in harvest; in discovering the innumerable curious things and inventing the countless cunning devices that diminish the burdens and increase the joys of life; they have delighted more in the swish of the scythe, the sound of the hammer, and the hum of the saw than in the roar of the cannon, the call of the bugle, or the beat of the drum; they have loved the chimes of the church bell more than the wild, wierd music of war. They have been content to cultivate the tree of knowledge and gather the ripened fruit of a civilization more splendid than that of the Greeks, more magnificent than that of the Romans, more enduring than that of the ancient Egyptians.

Since the very hour of this Nation's birth the American people have loved peace; they have loved it with an ardor second only to that with which they have loved their honor, their country, and their God. In the temple of peace the American people have worshiped, upon the altar of peace they have burned their incense, at the shrine of peace they have bowed their knees. They have never sought a war; they have never fought one except as a last resort. [Applause.]

We fought the War of the Revolution as the last means of severing the tyrannical ties that held us in bondage to Great Britain. We fought the War of 1812 in order that we might enjoy the freedom of the seas. We fought the great Civil War in order that this Government might endure, that slavery might die, and human liberty live forever and forever. We fought the Spanish-American War to the end that the tyranny and persecution of the Old World might cease to exist in the new. [Applause.]

And now, after a notable period of 19 glorious years of priceless peace, we are again at war. We are at this hour engaged in a mighty conflict more deadly than any that ever raged among ferocious beasts of African jungle; more barbarous than any ever conceived by American Indian; more stupendous than any ever dreamed of by Alexander the Great, the Macedonian madman, who, with his iron-shod foot on the throat of prostrate humanity, wept because there were no more worlds for him to conquer. [Applause.]

That our ardor may not abate, that our preparations may not pause, that our fighting may not cease until the Huns shall have made restitution of all that they have stolen, made all possible reparation for every injury they have inflicted, and given satisfactory guaranties that they will never again disturb the peace of the world, let us keep constantly in mind the reasons that impelled us to take up arms against the German Empire and its allies.

WHY ARE WE AT WAR?

Generally speaking, we are in this war because Germany, by her tyrannical, lawless, and murderous course, made it impossible for us to stay out of it without proving ourselves a Nation of mewling mollycoddles and cringing cowards. But, particularly speaking, we are in it because for more than two long years before our acceptance of the existence of a state of war the Imperial German Government maliciously outraged our citizens on land and sea; feloniously destroyed our property at home and abroad; brazenly invaded our rights; insolently violated our honor; wantonly insulted our flag, polluted its stripes, and dimmed its stars; she brutally murdered our men, mercilessly slaughtered our women, and fiendishly butchered our little children. With the full knowledge and apparent approval of her embassy in the shadow of the Capitol of this Nation, in open violation of every principle of international relationship, she endeavored to incite the Mexicans to make war upon us, offering them Arizona, Texas, and New Mexico as a reward for assailing us with fire and sword. She also tried to induce Japan to take up arms against us and thrust the spear of oriental militarism into the defenseless side of this peace-loving Republic.

After more than two years of these accumulated aggressions and unmitigated evils, we found national honor, the traditions of our fathers, the spirit of independence, the law of self-defense, the gaping wounds of perishing humanity, the shivering ghosts of murdered men and women—all pleading with us to resist this unutterable reign of Prussian terror with force and arms, and to shed more blood, if need be, in order that the blood of our own innocent ones might no longer be shed by the common enemies of all mankind. To these pathetic pleadings and melancholy supplications we have not turned a deafened ear. The heartless Huns, with their deadly fangs dripping with human gore, dragged us into this merciless war. They forced us to draw the sword of righteous retribution, and God helping us, that sword will not be sheathed until German Kaiser, Turkish Sultan, and Austrian Emperor have been scourged from their blood-soaked thrones [applause], until their hordes of inhuman assassins have been captured or conquered, and the peace of the world has been reestablished upon a foundation as enduring as the everlasting hills. [Applause.]

Unhappily, the voters of this country are obliged to carry on a campaign with ballots in America while their boys are carrying on a campaign with bayonets in France. In November the people must elect a Congress. Without the unstinted legislative support of that Congress the war can not be won. Without the support of that Congress our Army can not win a single battle; our Navy can not gain a single victory. Without the support of that Congress our soldiers and sailors can not be armed, provisioned, or equipped; their dependent families can not be clothed or sheltered or fed. Therefore this year's election is of extraordinary importance to everyone interested in winning the war.

There should be no politics in the conduct of our military campaign. But there can be no impropriety in our submitting to the country the record made by a Democratic President, a Democratic Congress, and a Democratic Cabinet in the management of this gigantic enterprise. If the people do not approve that record, they will rebuke those who made it by choosing new servants to represent them during the next two years. On the other hand, if that record conclusively shows that our achievements in war have not only equaled the Wilson administration's accomplishments in time of peace but that they have actually surpassed all human expectations, then the voters with their characteristic wisdom will make no change. [Applause.]

As to what has been done, let recent history speak to the point, and in the light of that history let the people record their verdict at the polls.

THE MATCHLESS RECORD OF OUR WAR-TIME ACHIEVEMENTS.

On April 6, 1917, the day on which we entered the war, our Army, including all of its various branches, consisted of 195,147 officers and men. By September 20, 1918, that Army had grown, as if by magic, until it had in it 3,062,513 officers and men. Of the latter number we have thoroughly trained, fully equipped, and safely transported more than 1,700,000 officers and men to the fighting front in France over 3,000 miles of ocean filled with mines and teeming with German submarines.

At the beginning of the war we had 257 forts, cantonments, and training camps. We now have 419. We then had only 7 field and base hospitals; we now have 388.

The medical department of the Army had in it 7,825 officers and men; it has grown until it is now an establishment of 260,984 officers and men.

By the application of the latest and most scientific methods of treating the sick and the afflicted we have reduced the death rate in Army camps to 7.5 men per thousand, the lowest rate ever recorded by any nation in any war, and a rate of more than 12 less deaths per thousand than occurred in our own training camps during the Spanish-American war.

We had 2,356 officers and men in the Corps of Engineers. We now have 264,457 officers and men in this department, and more than 205,000 of them are in France reconstructing war-wrecked industrial plants, laying railroads over which to transport troops and supplies, and building bridges over which our victorious armies of unnumbered thousands will later march to the pursuit of the demoralized and fleeing Huns.

When we entered the war our Navy had in all of its various branches an aggregate of 87,530 officers and men; it now has in it more than 590,000 officers and men. We had but 304 ships afloat; we now have 1,800, and under the direction of our efficient Secretary of the Navy others are being built faster than they can be counted, to the supreme satisfaction of our allies and the utter consternation of our foes. Assisted by the British Navy we have safely convoyed more than 1,500 troop and supply ships across the ocean.

On the day we entered the war our air service had in it 1,175 officers and men. There are more than 143,000 in it now. We then had 3 aviation fields; we now have 28. We had 210 training planes then; we now have more than 6,800 planes of various kinds.

The foregoing naked figures and facts concisely express the magnitude of the marvelous military program we have carried out during the first 17 months we have been at war.

The mere raising of our vast Army, figuratively speaking, in the twinkling of an eye, although an accomplishment without a parallel in history, is, nevertheless, but a part of our titanic performance; it is but a single act of a very long and complicated drama.

Every one of the millions in our new Army and every one of the hundreds of thousands in our new Navy had to be clothed and sheltered and fed. Every one of them had to be furnished equipment, including everything from the shoes on his feet to the hat or the helmet on his head; including everything from the rude tin cup from which he drinks his coffee to the rifle with which he shoots his foe; everything from the razor with which he shaves his face to the bayonet with which he slays the vicious Hun.

All these things, in hitherto undreamed of quantities, had to be provided by our Government for the comfort, safety, and effectiveness of our boys as they emerged from the pursuits of peace proudly to take their places in the serried ranks of war.

There were next presented for solution the difficult problems of transportation; the mobilization of industries; the speeding up of production; and the redistribution of labor so as to repair, as far as possible, the losses in man power which the mines, the factories, the farms, the foundries, the railroads, and all the other necessary industries of the country had suffered through the operation of the selective draft. All of these problems, with their innumerable perplexities, as well as all the unnumbered other problems directly or indirectly related to them, have been so unerringly solved by Woodrow Wilson and his assistants in the Congress and the Cabinet as to amaze mankind and make this the foremost Nation of all the world.

The name of Xerxes will live in history forever because he raised an army of more than a million men and transported it on a bridge of boats across the Hellespont where it is only a mile wide. But this feat of the Persian king, the result of years of preparation, pales into utter insignificance when compared with the achievement of Newton D. Baker in raising an army of more than 3,000,000 men in 17 months, and the accomplishment of Josephus Daniels in safely transporting more than 1,700,000 of them across the Atlantic Ocean. The successful transportation of our vast Army to Europe in itself adds a new luster to the fame of our already famous Navy, and inscribes the name of its great Secretary, Josephus Daniels, in the gilded book of immortality.

THE LIBERAL PROVISIONS WE HAVE MADE FOR OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS AND THEIR DEPENDENT FAMILIES.

Having called our boys to the colors, we proceeded to increase the pay of enlisted men in the Army and Navy almost a hundred per cent. Then, in order that our soldiers and sailors might be enabled to make ample provisions for the cherished ones they leave behind them when they go to war, in order that they might be free from the melancholy reflection on the eve of battle that their death might leave a decrepit father, a superannuated mother, a helpless wife, or an infant child in poverty and distress, we provided a war-risk insurance bureau through which, at minimum rates, anyone serving in the Army or Navy can take out an insurance policy for any amount up to $10,000, payable to any beneficiary the insured may elect to name.

After fully providing for every conceivable want of our soldiers and sailors we went a step farther and made provisions for the payment of liberal allowances to their dependent ones during the continuance of the war. These allowances run from $5 per month for a motherless child up to a maximum of $50 per month for an entire family.

We next provided compensation for the death or disability of soldiers and sailors resulting from their services to the Government in the present emergency. If a soldier or sailor die in the service, compensation ranging from $20 to $75 per month is paid to his widow, children, or dependent father and mother. In case of total disability the injured man is paid from $30 to $95 per month, according to the size of his family. In case of partial disability the soldier or sailor receives compensation in proportion to the severity of his affliction.

In brief, as a result of our liberal legislation, the American soldier is to-day the best paid, the best fed, the best clothed, the best sheltered, and the best protected fighting man on the face of the earth, while his dependent ones have been provided for with a degree of liberality and solicitude that establishes an unparalleled record for beneficent and generous legislation.

The foregoing very imperfectly indicates some of the momentous things the President and the Congress and the War and Navy Departments have done since the 6th day of April, 1917.

But, unfortunately for the historian and the speaker, some accomplishments are so vast that they can be barely stated but never adequately described. For instance, the making of the universe, including everything, from the tiniest grain of sand to the most stupendous star, is recounted in the first verse of Holy Writ in the simple language: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." In relating what has been done in the way of war-time legislation by the present Congress we can but reverently and feebly follow this notable example of inspired narration; we can only state the staggering facts without embellishment and leave it to a sane, sober, and serious world to comprehend their significance and do justice at the polls to those who, by bringing these facts into being, preserved the life, the liberty, the honor, and the glory of this Republic and saved from destruction the happiness and peace of all the future generations of men. [Applause.]

We ungrudgingly congratulate our historic opponent, the Republican Party, for its loyalty to our common country and its devotion to patriotic duty in this crisis. Its patriotism is not only unchallenged, but it has been signally recognized by this administration in many ways, particularly by the appointment to high official positions of such of its illustrious members as William H. Taft, Charles E. Hughes, Frank A. Vanderlip, Herbert Hoover, Charles M. Schwab, and scores of others, all of whom are faithfully serving the cause of liberty and effectually aiding in ridding the world of the blighting curse of abominable autocracy.

We so implicitly believe in the patriotism of the Republican masses that we confidently rely upon them to aid in reelecting every well-qualified Democratic Congressman who has loyally supported the military program of the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. We confidently rely upon the patriotic Republican masses to aid in defeating for Congress or the Senate every partisan politician and cheap political adventurer who is more solicitous for a victory at the polls than he is for a victory on the field of battle; who is more anxious to get himself into an office than he is to get the boys out of the trenches; who attempts to hide his indifference to the outcome of the present war by discussing the issues and opening the wounds of the Civil War.

It is more important in this election than in any other in the Nation's history that partisanism be laid aside and that the citizens cast their votes for those men and only for those men who are honestly and earnestly devoted to the cause of this country and determined to win the war. Any candidate of any party who is under the slightest valid suspicion of disloyalty because of his associations, relationships, utterances, or activities should be decisively defeated. No man of whose patriotism or loyalty there is the slightest doubt should be elected to an important office in which he could traffic in the lives of American soldiers, barter away official information, or surrender to a Prussian agent a single right of this Republic.

Fathers, relatives, and friends of the boys in France, make no mistake on election day. A vote against a loyal Democratic candidate or against the reelection of a Democratic Congressman who has faithfully supported the President's program is a vote to prolong the war and continue the absence of the boys in France. A vote for the reelection of such a Congressman is conclusive evidence of the voter's approval of the administration's supreme efforts to end the war with victory and lasting peace and to bring the boys back home. God pity the man who proves recreant to duty in such an hour and in such a cause.

POLITICAL FALSE ALARMS.

A few Republican politicians and candidates for Federal offices, seeing only with the piercing eye of vaulting ambition, look into the future for a field of action, oblivious to the tremendous tasks of this day and impotent to perform the duties of this hour. Statesmen of this particular school are proclaiming the inability of Democrats to enact constructive legislation that will be demanded at the close of the war and alleging that only Republicans can pass progressive laws. To all this the fathers of the boys who are fighting in France will be content to reply: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." For further answer to such fallacious arguments we shall say to our Republican friends, not by way of criticism but by way of assurance and for their peace of mind, that if Patrick Henry's rule is still sound, if the future may be safely judged by the past, and the lamp of experience is a lamp by which our feet may still be guided, then if constructive laws are written in the future, they will of necessity be written by the party of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATIC ACHIEVEMENTS BEFORE THE WAR.

For example, the Republicans were in control of the Federal Government almost continuously and completely for more than 40 years prior to the beginning of the Wilson administration. During all that time they were powerless to pass a currency law that would emancipate the business and the finance of the country from Wall Street control. Within the first year of the Wilson administration a Democratic Congress enacted a currency law that is admittedly the greatest legislative achievement of this century. This Democratic currency law at the beginning of the war saved this country from financial ruin and the credit of our allies from utter annihilation.

After their four decades of power the Republican Party turned over to Democracy the great railroad systems of the country in a condition of inefficiency, bankruptcy, and ruin. Many of them were under the grossest mismanagement and filled with water and graft. Under the stress of war it became impossible for them to perform their functions and a Democratic administration was forced to provide for their operation under Government control. [Applause.]

For almost a quarter of a century labor organizations and patriotic societies demanded the passage of an immigration law embodying the literacy test, but it remained for Democracy to write this legislation into the statute book.

It was the insistence of a Democratic House that gave the people the parcels-post law. It was a Democratic administration that perfected this law, and under it gave the public a delivery service, the utility of which it is impossible to exaggerate.

The farmers of the Nation were locked out of Congress for two decades by our opponents who controlled the Government. The Wilson administration opened every legislative door to the tillers of the soil and gave them the Federal farm-loan or rural-credit law.

We boldly assert and the record convincingly proves that the present administration, in less than 40 weeks, enacted 10 times more remedial legislation for labor than the Republican Party enacted for it in more than 40 years.

And who that has played a man's part in emancipating those that toil does not rejoice in the glorious record of devoted service and sacrifice made by American labor since we entered the war? While blood has gushed from the wounds of the boys "over there," rivers of perspiration have flowed from the brows of the patriots "over here" who have toiled on the railroads, in the mills and the mines, and in the factories and the fields. All praise to American labor! It has fought a good fight; it has honored itself and saved the life of the Nation; it has unqualifiedly kept the faith.

In turn, the Wilson administration has shown its appreciation of labor's loyal and generous service and maintained Democracy's reputation of being labor's best and stanchest friend by preserving, unimpaired, through this crisis every safeguard gained for the toilers through the struggles of a hundred years.

Prior to the beginning of the present administration there grew up in this country, under judicial sanction, a form of oppression commonly known as "government by injunction." The protest from the masses of the people against this evil was unanimous, but relief was never obtained until a Democratic Congress passed the Clayton law, which sounded the death knell of government by injunction. [Applause.]

Antitrust legislation, the hope of the producer and the dream of the consumer, couldn ever be realized until it was enacted by a Democratic administration.

Countless other examples could be cited, but the foregoing are sufficient to prove conclusively to every fair-minded man and woman that the Democratic Party is the real champion of constructive legislation and that it may be safely trusted to make laws for the people in time of peace as well as in time of war.

But no matter how glorious our history of the past, no matter how seductive the temptation to invade on the wings of imagination the undiscovered and alluring fields of the future, we must nevertheless remember that it is our imperative duty to devote our entire energy of mind and body to the all-important issue of winning the war. Until this issue has been determined in our favor no other earthly issue can be of any concern.

A MIGHTY ARMY AND A GLORIOUS CAUSE.

Nearly two millions of our boys have gone and other millions are preparing to go to the trenches to fight. Primarily not for Europe, but for America; not for some other government, but for our Government; not for glorification, but for self-preservation. Listen, and in imagination you can hear the tramp, tramp, tramp of our gallant soldiers marching to ruthless and relentless war. All of them will win honor and fame. The most of them will come back to us, and then, while the bands play and the flags flutter, while multitudes applaud and millions approve, we will put the palm of reward in their hands and the fadeless laurel of victory upon their brows. But, unfortunately, some of them will not return. Some of them will die in foreign lands and sleep in unmarked graves, and this is the saddest part of the awful tragedy that is now being enacted upon the stupendous stage of all the world; but—

How can man die better than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers
And the temples of his gods?

How can man die better than fighting to destroy this mailed and loathsome monster of Prussian militarism that purposes to enslave the world or engulf it in a sea of blood?

It were a thousand times better that we all die in the trenches and that liberty live than that we all ignominiously live to see national honor, international law, human liberty, and the religion of Jesus of Nazareth perish from the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Regardless of cost and danger, heedless of suffering and sacrifice, fears and tears, we must and will win this war. To lose it is to make hideous militarism the grand master of the globe, to extinguish the light of the world, and kindle the unquenchable fires of desolation and woe. To lose it is to forfeit the liberty of every citizen, endanger the life of every man, imperil the chastity of every woman, and jeopardize the freedom of every child. To win it is to crush autocracy and enthrone democracy, to strike the shackles from enslaved millions and set them free, to banish war and restore peace to a blood-washed, weary world.

By way of incitement to supreme effort and utmost action until all of our barbarous and bloodthirsty foes have been subdued, let us bear in mind that our defeat would mean an immediate repetition at our very doors of all the horrors perpetrated by German soldiers in Belgium and France.

WHAT THE HUNS HAVE DONE TO OTHERS, AND WOULD DO TO US.

Official reports, the truth of which is not denied, show that at Haecht, in Belgium, the red-handed Huns nailed innocent girls to cottage doors and crucified them as the Savior was crucified upon Calvary; that at Hofstade, the Prussian fiends decapitated unoffending ministers of the gospel, cut the heads and hands and feet from children, while babes were torn from their mothers' arms and dashed to death in the streets by brutal beasts of the Kaiser's army as a part of Germany's campaign of frightfulness. At Pepinster, helpless, harmless women were outraged before the eyes of their husbands and their children; later their bodies were mutilated, their lives destroyed, and last of all the husbands and the nursing babes of these outraged and murdered women were butchered by the cutthroats of the beast of Berlin.

These instances of blood-curdling barbarism could be infinitely multiplied, but their multiplication is unnecessary, for we are already fully alive to the enormity of the suffering and sorrow that would inevitably follow us and our posterity forever if we should fail to win this war. If we should stop short of a decisive victory, our own country would sooner or later be invaded by a German army, and then all the indescribable horrors and excruciating tortures inflicted upon our allies would be visited in full measure upon our own people.

This is the fateful and decisive hour of history. If we should now relax our efforts, withhold our services, or refuse to make our sacrifices, Germany would eventually set up her military machine on this continent. And when Prussian militarism comes to our shores look to see every American pay tribute to the Kaiser or serve as a slave to a German master until death cancels the bonds of his servitude. Look to see American women outraged; American children maimed, mangled, and slaughtered; American men tortured to death; girls crucified; prattling babes murdered and their hands and feet hacked from their bodies. Look to see American fields laid waste, villages depopulated, cities burned to ashes, property confiscated, churches desecrated, the ministers of mercy assassinated, the precepts of Christianity mocked, and the deeds of humanity scorned.

God forbid that the Prussian reign of frightfulness shall ever curse this land. God grant that we may so effectively do our part, so courageously fight our fight, and so heroically defend our homes, our loved ones, and our native land that intruding foot of fearsome foe may never, never tread the soil over which Old Glory waves.

But let us have confidence and courage, for this war will end in a sweeping victory for the armies of our allies and ourselves, because we are fighting for freedom against tyranny; for liberty against slavery; for Christianity against paganism; for justice against injustice; for eternal right against monstrous wrong; for the deathless teachings of the Great Jehovah against the ephemeral philosophy of Nietzsche, Von Treitschke, Bernhardi, and Mohammed.

Then conquer we must, for our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust,"
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

If it be asked why the innocent must be sacrificed for the guilty, why millions of righteous must perish in their struggle against myriads of godless men who have hitherto flourished like the green bay tree, answer can only be made that it is now, as it has ever been, the inscrutable way of Almighty God to blot out wickedness with the blood of his saints.

From Calvary's crimsoned cross to the ensanguined battle fields of the Marne and the Somme sacrifice has been the immutable purchase price of progress, while civilization has written every luminous page of its resplendent history in profusions of precious blood.

[At this point a body of French Legionaires, guests of the Nation, entered one of the galleries, whereupon the Members of the House rose and received them with applause.]

Digressing for a moment, I venture to extend, on behalf of the House, to you battle-scarred heroes of France, who have just entered the gallery, a warm welcome to the great American Republic which was christened in the commingled blood of your renowned ancestors and our illustrious sires.

As Napoleon's veterans fought at Austerlitz, as the soldiers of Leonidas sacrificed at Thermopylæ, as the warriors of Miltiades won at Marathon, so you stout-hearted patriots of France fought at Verdun, sacrificed at the Somme, and won on the bloody banks of the Marne. For your sacrifice, your valor, and your victory civilization will forever be your debtor, and humanity will forever sing your praise. You are thrice and four times welcome in our midst. What is ours is yours, to the last crumb in our cupboards and the last drop in our cups.

As we have no words of our own that are vigorous enough to express our admiration for you or our appreciation of your glorious achievements, let the celestial muse of Virgil in the following lines from the Æneid portray what we conceive to be the sentiments of every American for you, the gallant champions of civilization's cause:

In you this age is happy, and this earth;
And parents more than mortal gave you birth.
While rolling rivers into seas shall run,
And round the space of heaven the radiant sun,
While trees the mountain tops with shade supply,
Your honor, name, and praise shall never die.

WHAT OUR BOYS ARE DOING OVER THERE.

Mr. Speaker, to-day more than seventeen hundred thousand of America's best and bravest sons are gallantly fighting in far-off France, vindicating humanity's rights, avenging civilization's wrongs, and paying with accrued interest a heavy obligation that we have owed the French people since Rochambeau held up the hands of Washington at Yorktown [applause] and Lafayette fought at Brandywine for American independence. [Applause.] How grandly those boys beyond the sea are maintaining the honor of this country and living up to the brightest and best traditions of this Republic! How proudly we read of their victories; how gratefully we learn of their sacrifices; how devoutly we pray for their safe return to their loved and loving ones who are keeping the "home fires burning" and looking with anxious eyes and tear-stained cheeks for the dawn of peace.

In France, the land of chivalry and beauty, through countless lines of battle, with machine guns and cannon in front of them; with asphyxiating gases enveloping them; with the air filled with death-dealing craft above them; with exploding mines beneath them—through all these hellish horrors American boys are proudly bearing the flag of this Republic [applause]; the flag that has never known a failure or suffered a defeat; the flag that makes tyranny tremble and freedom rejoice; the flag that beckons the downtrodden and oppressed of every country on the globe to this land of liberty above which the great dome of promise is studded with the shining stars of hope; the flag that waves over democracy's cradle; the flag that will finally float above autocracy's grave. [Applause.] This is the flag that the American soldiers from the wind-swept north and the sun-kissed south will eventually carry through plundered cities, over blood-soaked battle fields; past desecrated temples; by ruined cathedrals; through bleeding Belgium to the river Rhine, and from the Rhine to the Spree, and across the Spree to Berlin, where, at last, it will proudly float from the spires of the Kaiser's palace and majestically wave above the ruins of the Hohenzollern's throne. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia be allowed 15 minutes more on account of the interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from West Virginia be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEELY. We have briefly outlined the arduous task and the stupendous undertaking of the American soldiers who are fighting and are going to fight for you and for me. These boys, in the morning time of life, with every door in the world of infinite opportunity open wide to receive them, with every breeze bringing them promises of future glory, laid their last hope and their last ambition upon the altar of their country, and leaving the rich treasures of heart and home behind them entered the welter of war to pour out their blood as the purchase price of our safety.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

And what shall we do to make their sacrifices effective; what can we do to strengthen their arms, dishearten their foes, and speed the coming of the joyous day of Germany's unconditional surrender? There is much we can do, and every patriot will do his utmost. He that does less than his best in this crisis is a slacker, and he that does nothing is a disgrace to the Nation and not entitled to live in a land of freedom or share the protection of the American flag.

We must forget the word profit and cease to think about money making during the war. Wealth in this country without victory would bring no satisfaction or pleasure to its possessor; moth and rust would corrupt it; thieves would break through and steal it; it would take the wings of the morning and fly away. The monster who will profiteer at the expense of the flesh and blood of the boys in the trenches is in infamy next to Judas Iscariot, who betrayed his Savior for 30 pieces of silver.

At this particular time patriotism is infinitely better than profit, generosity is more estimable than greed, and mercy is sublimer than money.

To be specific, the farmer must raise more grain in order that the soldiers in the trenches may not go hungry to battle or empty to bed. The miner must dig more coal so that the smelting furnaces and munition factories may be run at capacity night and day. The banker must lend greater aid in solving the financial problems of this Government that is now paymaster for half the world. More doctors must go to the front, for they are needed there. Let the lawyers get out of the courthouse and into the firing line of freedom and do more war work at home or abroad. Let the preachers stand this monster of Prussian militarism in their pulpits, strip it of the multitudinous masks it wears, and mercilessly show its marble heart, its snaky eyes, and insatiate maw to their congregations. Let them teach the people that the extinction of this hell-born monstrosity means liberty and life and that its survival means certain bondage and ignominious death.

All must buy liberty bonds; must buy them again and again and again. They are the best investment in the world. They are secured by a first mortgage on the entire wealth of this Nation, which is now more than $250,000,000,000. Our annual income is about $50,000,000,000, while our total indebtedness, including all war expenditures to date, is less than $16,000,000,000, or less than one-third of our income for one year. If we do not buy bonds, our Government will be without money, and without money the war will fail and our boys in the trenches will be forced to surrender to the maiming, torturing, and murdering Huns. Let no man be stingy with his dollars while the soldiers are being generous with their lives.

We must give generously to the Red Cross, for it is more than worthy of our support. Its angels of mercy—the Red Cross nurses—will go where shot and shell are screaming, where rivers of blood are flowing, where death hovers over fields of battle, and there they will care for the suffering, comfort the dying, and with their magical remedies and marvelous skill they will bind up the wounds of the soldier, stanch his blood, allay his fever, and banish his every ache and pang and pain. [Applause.]

All should give to the Army Y. M. C. A. and other similar war-time organizations, for they will safeguard the soldiers' moral fabric, without which even the strongest man becomes as weak as a little child. No matter who one is or what his race or rank or station, there is a work for him to do; there is a place for him to fill; there is a cross for him to bear. [Applause.]

WHAT THE VOTERS WILL DO OVER HERE.

There is one other service of inestimable value that every voter can perform, and that every patriot will perform, and that is the service of going to the polls on election day and casting a ballot for those candidates who can and will do most to bring this war to an early conclusion and bring the boys back home. No candidate of any party is qualified for office unless he is loyal to the core, unless he is a hundred per cent patriot and a hundred per cent against Prussian militarism. If a candidate of any party has, since we entered the war, been neutral as between this country and the German Empire, or hostile to our allies; if he has ever apologized for Prussian barbarism, justified the sinking of the Lusitania, or declined to back up the soldiers at the front with every resource at his command, let every loyal citizen vote against him, work against him, and help to consign him to political oblivion on election day.

Let it be repeated that the only issue before the American people is the issue of winning the war; the issue of crushing German militarism until it can never again raise its snaky head, open its all-devouring mouth, or exhale its devastating breath. This is the issue that will take every father, brother, and friend of a soldier to the polls; it is the issue upon which every patriot will mark his ticket; it is the issue upon which every red-blooded, loyal-hearted American will cast his ballot. All other issues, for the time being, are dead and buried, and it would be as impossible to find the graves in which they slumber as to find the sepulcher in which Moses was laid by the hands of the angels.

The voter who at this critical time supports a candidate for Federal office who is not in full accord with the war program of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy sticks a knife into the back of every American soldier, prolongs the war, increases its horrors, and multiplies the number of the boys who shall see their native land no more. In this year of stress and strife no patriot will permit love of party to make him vote against the interest of his country. [Applause.]

Democrats, Republicans, Prohibitionists, and Socialists, Protestants and Catholics, Gentiles and Jews are all fighting together in France, shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, and hand to hand. They are enriching the soil of Flanders with their blood; they are dying side by side, and the radiant angels of the same merciful God are bearing their immortal spirits in invisible chariots to the same Paradise where they will, in common, walk the streets that are paved with stars. If our boys can forget their politics and their differences of opinion and die together over there, shall we dishonor their memory and desecrate their unmarked graves by refusing to vote together over here on the 5th day of November? Forbid it, Almighty God. [Applause.]

Let every voter aim his ballot just as the boys are aiming their bullets and directing their bayonets, point-blank, at the vitals of the Huns.

And how can one determine for whom to vote? The question is easily answered. First, the acid test of loyalty should be applied without fear or favor to every candidate. Anyone that can not withstand the test should be scratched off without an instant's hesitation. If the voter will follow the rule laid down by the Savior he will make no mistake on election day. It is as follows: "And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

If both candidates are equally loyal, then let the voter determine the question, Which of them can and will be more helpful to the Commander in Chief in bringing the war to a successful conclusion; which can and will do more for the boys at the front? And how can one answer these questions? By a simple process of deductive reasoning. Upon the President is the supreme responsibility of directing the operations of all of our armed forces and winning victories for our cause. There is not a patriot in the Nation who does not want to help the President bear his heavy burden. There is not a patriot who questions the wisdom and righteousness or the success of the President's leadership. Therefore let that leadership be strengthened by giving our great Commander in Chief men of his own party faith, who are in full accord with him not only on one question but on every question, to hold up his hands till the end of the war. To elect any man to a Federal office who is not in harmony in heart and thought and word and deed with Woodrow Wilson is to proclaim to Berlin that the American people have repudiated their Chief Executive, that sentiment in the Nation is divided, that the Kaiser has a henchman on the way to the Capitol, and that we are against the war. Such a proclamation would mean the conscription of more American boys, the shedding of more American blood, and the loss of more American lives.

WHAT MR. LINCOLN SAID.

In 1864 McClellan, a Democrat, ran against Lincoln for the presidency, and at that time the Civil War was still raging. Mr. Lincoln, by uttering a homely but immortal phrase, decided his fate and also the fate of the Nation. He said that the American people had too much sense to "swap" horses in the middle of the stream. And he was right. The people not only reelected him President, but they also reelected, by a decisive majority, a Republican Congress to stand by him and support him and help him solve the war problems of the Nation. We are to-day in the midst of a war whose responsibilities, complications, and horrors are even greater than those of the great Civil War. The people have just as much sense in 1918 as they had in 1864, and they are going to use it to the same effect. On the 5th day of November history will repeat itself, and the voters will proclaim with a voice that will cross the ocean and reverberate through the Kaiser's palace in Berlin that the American people will not "swap" off the party of Woodrow Wilson in the middle of this blood-red stream of world-wide war. [Applause.]

SUPPORT THE PRESIDENT.

Realizing that a repudiation of the President's party at the polls would give more encouragement to our enemies than the capture of an American army corps; realizing that it would be more disastrous to our cause than the loss of a great battle on the western front, the American people will, on election day, indorse, by an overwhelming majority, Woodrow Wilson and his course by electing a Congress and a Senate of the President's own party faith to stand by him, to aid him and hold up his hands until the war clouds are lifted, until the smoke of battle has cleared away, until the Goddess of Liberty again waves the emblem of peace over palm and pine. And what father, brother, or friend of a soldier will fail to indorse the administration of Woodrow Wilson, the greatest moral and spiritual leader on the globe? Who in all the history of mankind has ever been endowed with more profound wisdom or more penetrating and prophetic vision? Who has ever more safely and successfully led or more faithfully and devotedly served a great people? The world is accepting the words of Woodrow Wilson as the words of an oracle. The people of England, France, Italy, the islands of the sea, and more than 100,000,000 Americans are following his footsteps as zealously as the Mussulman follows Mohammed. They are approving his official actions as the actions of a political Messiah.

On the 5th day of November, let every patriot, for the sake of his Nation, for the cause of humanity and the life of his boy, ungrudgingly support the plans, the purposes, and the party of Woodrow Wilson, a man who in leadership is a Joshua; in statesmanship, a Jefferson; in wisdom, a Franklin; in courage, a Jackson; in justice, a Lincoln; and in patriotism, a Washington; a man whose mind is a mirror that reflects the possibilities of the future as well as the promises of the present and the prophecies of the past; a man whose judgment is as unerring as the mariner's compass and whose purposes are as constant as the northern star. [Applause.]

THE WAR CLOUD'S SILVER LINING.

As we unqualifiedly dedicate our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to the completion of the trying task before us, may we not console ourselves with the thought that after the wilderness came the promised land; that after the darkest hour of the night comes the splendor of the morning, the glory of the sunrise, and the grandeur of a new-born day; that after the crucifixion of the sinless Savior, paradise opened wide its portals to all the children of men. May we not hope that after this carnival of destruction and this holocaust of humanity men will be so sickened with bloodshed, so horrified with devastation, and so appalled with wholesale butchery that they will, with one accord, forsake the demon of hate and swear eternal allegiance to the everlasting God of love. May we not believe that the sun of righteousness will eventually rise with healing in his wings and illumine every highway; that the hands of the Infinite will finally make every crooked path straight; and that the pure white light of a crucified Christ, streaming down from the ineffable throne of God, will at last dispel the darkness that obscures our vision, stays our progress, and envelops our little lives? Let us fervently hope and devoutly pray that when this wicked world-wide war is over the Prince of Peace in all His glory will instantly set up His everlasting kingdom in the hearts of men; that Pope's dream of the Messiah may be fully realized, and that—

> All crime shall cease and ancient fraud shall fail,
> Descending justice lift aloft her scale,
> Peace o'er the world her olive wand extend,
> And white-robed innocence from heaven descend.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DECKER). The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the rule as to the printing of conference reports in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act passed the other day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the bill to supplement the second liberty bond act. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state the substance of the conference report?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Senate made several amendments, but receded on all except on the question of giving the President power to prohibit the sale and transfer of bonds and certificates. The House concurred with an amendment striking out the word "prohibit" as it relates to the sale of bonds and certificates of indebtedness, but giving the President the power to investigate and regulate such transactions with a further provision which I will read:

(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange—

And so forth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under that provision, does the gentleman think the President would have the power to prohibit the sale of bonds on the stock exchanges?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think so. I do not think he would have the power to prohibit, but he could regulate.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire further whether the bill in its present form as agreed to by the conferees is more liberal as to the disposition of liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it limits the President's power.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill has not been modified in other particulars?

Mr. KITCHIN. In two small amendments, putting in a capital "I" and a capital "T." Otherwise the bill is exactly as it passed the House, and the material amendment is, as I said awhile ago, in respect to the bonds and certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that that will stop the bonds from being negotiated?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not.

Mr. MADDEN. I think so, and I think it would be very unfortunate if that should be the case, because, while it is intended to stabilize the bonds, I think it will have the reverse effect.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that the conferees considered that question very thoroughly and we also had the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee, and the conferees all were of the unanimous opinion that this provision will help to stabilize the bonds. Gentlemen will remember that the bill is exactly as it passed the House, with this exception, that they have taken the bonds and certificates out of the prohibition clause of the section and amended it and substituted this provision.

Mr. MADDEN. I would be glad to have the gentleman read it.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. That subdivision (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and, for the purpose of strengthening, sustaining, and broadening the market for bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, or preventing frauds upon the holders thereof, and of protecting such holders, he may investigate and regulate, by means of licenses or otherwise (until the expiration of two years after the date of the termination of the present war with the Imperial German Government, as fixed by his proclamation), any transactions in such bonds or certificates by or between any person or persons: Provided, That nothing contained in this subdivision (b) shall be construed to confer any power to prohibit the purchase or sale for cash or for notes eligible for discount at any Federal reserve bank of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States; and he may require any person engaged in any transaction referred to in this subdivision to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

Mr. MADDEN. They would have to be sold. The President might make a regulation so that if a person holding a bond which he was obliged to sell to save himself from bankruptcy could not dispose of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no restriction on the right of the President to make regulations.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we give him power to make regulations. I want to say to the gentleman that two Senators, one a Senator from Massachusetts and the other a Senator from Georgia, and also Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, took the position which the gentleman now takes, and after discussing the whole proposition they were perfectly willing to put in this provision. In fact, it was the suggestion of one of the Senators.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, if the gentlemen who have given it careful consideration are satisfied that it does not prohibit legitimate business transactions, very well.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that the President's regulation would not go to the extent of preventing reasonable transactions.

Mr. MADDEN. For example, suppose the gentleman himself had $50,000 worth of Government bonds and he found himself facing bankruptcy if he could not dispose of them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that the President could not under this make any rules or regulations saying that I could not sell my bonds to my bank or could not borrow money upon them.

Mr. MADDEN. They would be worthless if that could not be done.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to this request.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for just a minute. We have a very urgent letter from the Secretary of the Treasury asking that this report be considered and disposed of to-day, because they want to begin at once to advertise and to set on foot the beginning of the liberty-bond campaign on September 28. I have explained the only difference, and there is no doubt that the House will adopt this report.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman knows very well that the plans for this campaign are going ahead, and I do not believe that a delay of one day will seriously hamper the matter. The more important measures are on which conference reports are offered, the more often is the request made that we consider them without printing, and we have a little preliminary discussion, which is informal in its nature, and then we vote upon the conference report, with 99.44 per cent of the membership not knowing what is in the report until the next day, when they find out what they have voted for.

Mr. KITCHIN. My thought was it would not take the House a day, or even an hour, to comprehend exactly what this amendment was, which is as plain as language could make it, and I was sure the House would adopt the conference report either to-day, if we voted on it to-day, or to-morrow or the next day, if we voted on it then. I was trying to save time.

Mr. WALSH. There is no difference, except the President's power is limited rather than——

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, the House bill, which the House overwhelmingly passed—passed unanimously—gave the President absolutely the power to prohibit any sale of bonds, which of course he would not exercise. Now, this limits that power. This strikes out the word "prohibit" and gives simply the power to investigate and make regulations, which of course must be reasonable regulations; and goes further than that, and it says that nothing in this provision can be construed to give power to prohibit the sale or transfer of bonds or indebtedness for cash or notes negotiable for discount at any Federal reserve bank.

Mr. HAYES. Is this a complete agreement?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Signed by all the conferees?

Mr. WALSH. How much discussion does the gentleman contemplate permitting? We have got an important matter here which has been agreed upon will be disposed of to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will give discussion if the House should want it, but I should not think there would be very much discussion. I should not think any person could object to this provision when the House bill was a good deal more rigid and gave the President considerably more power than this does.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HAYES. As to whether or not there is a complete agreement on the part of all the conferees.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; a complete, signed agreement by those who participated in the conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say, having in mind the last statement the gentleman made a moment ago that the bill was much less rigid than when it passed the House, that when the bill was under consideration in the House I offered an amendment to strike out that word "prohibit" where it applied to the sale or transfer of bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman offered an amendment, but the amendment was offered at the wrong place and the gentleman did not have time to perfect it.

Mr. DENISON. And while I was trying to perfect my amendment another amendment of a similar kind, but a little more sweeping, was offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], and then the gentleman from North Carolina made his very forceful speech against it and against taking away from the President this power to prohibit the sale of bonds; and his speech was so forceful that he frightened a good many of us into believing that if we voted to take out that word "prohibit" we would be doing an unpatriotic thing. I wanted to know whether the chairman of the committee thinks if we vote now to accept this action of the Senate, which is exactly what I was trying to get done, we will still be thought to be unpatriotic?

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not mean to state that the gentleman is mistaken in that; not at all. I said that gentlemen of the House—for instance, I said that Mr. HAYES was as patriotic as anyone whom I knew and is as intensely loyal as any man in the Capitol, and my argument was that this would give better protection to a certain class of holders, a smaller class, too. Now, I insisted on its being just like the House passed it, and the Secretary of the Treasury stated to the conferees what I stated. He said that it was essential to give the President power to use the word "prohibit" and he would not take the responsibility if we struck it out and did not give some power to prohibit certain kinds of transactions and I agreed with him. I said to the House then the fear which the gentlemen of the House who opposed the word "prohibit" entertained was absolutely groundless because it is inconceivable that the President would ever exercise the power which you gentlemen feared he might exercise. Now, then, after all that, after I made the very forceful speech, as the gentleman says, and if I can afford finally in the interest of speedy legislation, so they can go ahead with the liberty-loan drive, to accept the striking out of the word "prohibit," and the Secretary of the Treasury, who is responsible for the sale of these bonds, can reluctantly accept this in order to speed up and permit us to proceed at once with the liberty-loan campaign, it looks as if all the other gentlemen of the House could.

Mr. DENISON. I agree with the gentleman exactly. I think the Senate amendment is exactly right and I thought we should have amended it that way ourselves when I offered my amendment to strike out the word "prohibit." I think the President should have the power to regulate transactions in bonds, but not the power to prohibit their sale or transfer.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course, we have not read this conference report, and all we know is from hearing the reading and what the gentleman says. As I understand, it limits this power to two years?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. That was discussed in the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested, and I told the gentleman I would suggest that in conference and it ought to have been in the bill, but it was too late when the gentleman spoke to me about it to so amend the bill before it passed the House.

Mr. ROBBINS. The provision now in the report is that the power is limited to regulation, not to prohibit.

Mr. KITCHIN. The power we give the President with respect to bonds and certificates of indebtedness is investigation and regulation, and we limit it to two years after the termination of the war.

Mr. HAYES. Like the gentleman from Illinois, I desired only to have stricken from the bill that power to anyone to make or to prohibit sales, but now as the gentleman explains it, as the conferees have agreed upon it, I have no objection whatever.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood that was the gentleman's position, but the gentleman——

Mr. HAYES. But now, as the gentleman explains it and as the conferees have agreed upon it, I have no objection whatever. As I explained when the bill was before the House originally, I have no fear of proper regulation. The fear I had was that a regulation that might amount to a prohibition would interfere with a sale of the bonds and their value afterwards.

Mr. KITCHIN. As it appears now it is substantially the position he took on the floor, but, unfortunately, the gentleman's amendment, which was written hurriedly in the exciting moments of the debate, went further than the word "prohibit."

Mr. HAYES. It struck out the regulation also.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think this is what the House would be perfectly willing to agree to if I could get unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the conference report.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to let him read the statement instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. The report should be printed somewhere in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will all go in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman should couple with his request that the statement and report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all these papers in regard to the conference report go in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 805).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That subdivision (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"'(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and, for the purpose of strengthening, sustaining and broadening the market for bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, of preventing frauds upon the holders thereof, and of protecting such holders, he may investigate and regulate, by means of licenses or otherwise, (until the expiration of two years after the date of the termination of the present war with the Imperial German Government, as fixed by his proclamation) any transaction in such bonds or certificates by or between any person or persons: Provided, That nothing contained in this subdivision (b) shall be construed to confer any power to prohibit the purchase or sale for cash, or for notes eligible for discount at any Federal reserve bank, of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States; and he may require any person engaged in any transaction referred to in this subdivision to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters or other papers, in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

CLAUDE KITCHIN,

J. W. FORDNEY,
J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. SIMMONS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is recognized.

THE ABBOTT GRENADE GUN.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, at an earlier stage of our war preparations we heard much about "paper guns," meaning, of course, designs and blue prints without the facilities for producing real guns. This was true for a long time after we were in the war as to the Browning gun. I am glad to say that, so far as producing them is concerned, the Browning guns, both light and heavy, are now well advanced in quantity production.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman states that the production of the Browning guns, large and small, is now satisfactory. The gentleman does not state whether or not its use is satisfactory. Can the gentleman enlighten us on that question?

Mr. TILSON. I wish I could enlighten my friend on that question, for I am very much interested. I may say to the gentleman—and I speak with a degree of hesitation—that I have had some misgivings as to the probable effectiveness of the light gun. I am afraid that there is one point connected with its use that is not yet entirely satisfactory. I will say, further, to the gentleman that I have not even talked about it with any official, and that my fears are based largely upon my own very limited trials of the gun. I hope it will turn out that there is no ground whatever for my fears, but the gentleman has asked me and I have answered him truthfully.

I have here to-day a real paper gun, made of paper. It is the invention of Mr. Wayne Abbott, of California. He is a very modest man, who wears a service flag with three stars for three sons in the service, and who, on the 12th of this month, registered himself for service under the new selective-draft law. Mr. Abbott has lived thus far a somewhat interesting and sometimes thrilling life. He hopes to add other chapters even more interesting by actual service alongside of his boys in the trenches.

For a time he was a balloonist. In order to relieve the monotony of drifting comfortably across the country in a free balloon he often amused himself by leaping from his perch in the clouds and descending by means of a parachute. Incidentally he has turned over to the Government what seems to be a very practical invention in the shape of an automatic parachute for descending from an injured airplane, and it is being hopefully tested out.

The Abbott paper gun or mortar is made of paper fiber inclosing a roll of galvanized sheet iron. Here it is [indicating]. It looks more like a music roll than anything else, and can be carried quite as conveniently in one hand or suspended from one finger. The breech block is of wood, with a simple electric-battery attachment to fire the piece.

The ammunition used is the hand grenade. The use of the grenade in this war is general, almost universal, and continuous. It ranges all the way from the Stokes mortar shell down through all forms of rifle grenade to the simplest hand grenade made, which is probably the Mills or our own Mark I service grenade. This is one of ours [indicating].

Hand grenades are very dangerous, often to friend as well as foe. In previous remarks I have referred to the great number of British dead on Salisbury Plain as a result of training with the Mills grenade. The natural limitations of human strength make somewhat small the danger zone of a hand-thrown grenade; and if it is made of malleable iron or steel, the thrower himself is within the zone.

All sorts of contrivances have been devised and tried for increasing the range of the hand grenade beyond that possible for the human arm. Even the old catapult has been tried. The Stokes mortar, firing a much larger and more expensive shell, attains a maximum range of about 1,200 yards, but below 400 yards it is not entirely satisfactory. The rifle grenade must suffice for the shorter ranges down to the range of the human arm, about 50 yards. The rifle grenade is much more expensive than the hand grenade. Its use for this purpose subtracts a rifle from the firing line and injures the rifle, besides requiring the use of a special grenade discharger.

The Abbott paper gun seems to cover satisfactorily the range from 400 yards down to 50 yards. I have fired grenades from it and know that they can be fired more than 500 yards. It is readily adjustable to fire any size, make, or kind of hand grenade. Here is one of our service grenades and here one of the Wales impact grenades. The impact grenade when perfected should give the better results, because it obviates the necessity for the time fuse.

The accuracy of this gun is quite remarkable. With a sufficient number of them a temporary barrage can be laid down. The distance thrown is determined by the angle of fire. Knowing the distance, this spirit level [indicating] is set at the required number of degrees indicated on this arc [indicating] and made fast by a set screw. Thereafter it is only necessary to see that the air bubble is in the middle of the glass when the piece is fired in order to reach the target.

The tactical uses of such a weapon may prove to be numerous and very important. One obvious use will suggest itself to everyone. Assume that the enemy trench is 300 yards from our own front-line trench, which is not an unusual distance. A number of these light, simple grenade throwers from our front trench can make life somewhat uncomfortable in the enemy trench.

Another very important use suggests itself. Enemy machine-gun nests are the bane of an advancing force, and often exact very heavy toll. They are the strongest resource of a rear guard, since they are the most difficult to dislodge by the advancing infantry, especially when tanks are not or can not be used. They are often in shell holes where no rifle fire can reach them. If with one of these simple, inexpensive guns a hand grenade can be landed anywhere within the shell holes, it means "taps" for all the occupants. Masonry or concrete "pill boxes" will be required to furnish protection from them.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. How are these hand grenades propelled out of this gun?

Mr. TILSON. They are propelled by means of a powder charge at the base of this wooden container. The container has the powder charge in the rear and carries the grenade in the front.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. How is it possible to hold the gun sufficiently rigid as to maintain the desired angle?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, almost any sort of a device can be used. In fact, a man can hold it against the ground or against the wall of the trench with his hand as steadily as a rifle, or he can make any sort of a temporary arrangement. A forked stick set to give the right slope would serve the purpose. By observing the air bubble, there is no trouble in holding it at the degree desired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. As the gentleman knows, the Stokes mortar cleans itself at every discharge. Would this clean itself, or would it have to be emptied out or turned inside out?

Mr. TILSON. There is nothing left in the gun. The container and the grenade go out together, separating after leaving the gun.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have—how long?

Mr. TILSON. If I am to be asked any questions—and I hope that will occur—I should like to have 10 minutes. Otherwise I should need at least five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Do these go off like the Stokes mortar, by a percussion cap?

Mr. TILSON. No. Attached to the breechblock is an electric battery, and the gun is fired by this means, as I will show to the gentleman a little later on.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In regard to the grenades that are fired by contact, is there any danger with respect to the force which impels them in firing these grenades causing them to fire prematurely?

Mr. TILSON. No. The safety devices of the impact hand grenade thus far developed are two in number. One is a cotter pin and the other a chain device. The cotter pin is drawn when the grenade is placed in the container. The chain is not removed until it is actually fired from the gun. The grenade is gone before the chain is withdrawn, and there is no danger while it remains in place.

The Wales impact grenade, the use of which I have just described, is now being developed in a form containing a gas check at both ends of the grenade, and made so that it can be fired from the rifle, from this gun, or thrown by hand.

This is not the only size in which this gun can be made. It can be made up to 6 or 8 inches. It can be used to throw gas shells just as well.

The obvious drawback which may render general use of this weapon not practicable is the wooden container with its wire connections and detonator, one of which must go with each grenade. The keeping on hand ready for use a supply of these, although it is a simple, inexpensive affair, may prove to be a serious handicap and prevent its general use as an offensive weapon.

I will show just how the gun is operated, and then gentlemen can judge for themselves. These contact points on the side are very simple affairs, the connections running down to the battery. The wire connections slip right into them. When the grenade is in place the container is dropped into the gun thus [indicating]. It is aimed, with the aid of the spirit level, at the proper angle to reach the target. When so set and ready to fire, all that remains to be done is simply to press the button [indicating] and it does the rest. [The gun fired, throwing a light rubber ball into the rear gallery.]

As you all know, I have followed and studied with considerable zeal and earnestness the development and production of firearms, ammunition, and other war materials since long before we entered the war, and from time to time have endeavored to present to the House in helpful form the results of my labors. For the present, at any rate, this concludes my numerous and somewhat extended series of war-material speeches.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank the membership of the House on both sides of the aisle for so graciously and so frequently yielding me the privilege of the floor and for the helpful and apparently interested attention uniformly given to all my remarks on these subjects. [Applause.]

My thanks are further due to the House for the honor conferred on me a few days ago by the unanimous authorization to have a compilation of all my speeches on arms, ammunition, airplanes, and gas masks printed as a House document.

The heart, soul, and life of every American patriot are now absorbed—yes, submerged—in the supreme effort to end the war by a complete and overwhelming victory. Each of us here is doing what he can toward that end. The matter of having at the several battle fronts an early and adequate supply of the best possible matériel is not only important but it is vitally essential. It is a matter of life or death to thousands, and possibly of victory or defeat in the end. Thus far it has seemed to me that the most effective service that I can render is along this particular line. In doing this work my constant aim and desire have been to do my part here manfully, just as our brave boys "over there" are doing theirs gloriously. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized.

HEROISM OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the presence of 100 brave French soldiers who sat in the galleries a few moments ago and were repeatedly cheered by this House makes a fitting prelude to a short statement I desire to submit on American soldiers of equal bravery and valor.

The pages of history are rich with the record of heroism of American troops, but in this hour of national sacrifice I ask the House to pause for a moment to pay tribute to the heroic living and dead of the gallant Thirty-second Division, American Army, now fighting in Europe, a division that has won its place in history.

Sons of Wisconsin and sons of Michigan who had never faced a gun but were inspired by loyal devotion to their country—these boys are entitled to an honorable place in history side by side with the veteran Wisconsin Iron Brigade that turned the tide of battle at Gettysburg during the dark days of the Civil War.

Censorship prevents giving details that some day will be a glorious page in a chapter filled with heroic deeds. Briefly stated, the Thirty-second Division, composed of the Sixty-third Michigan and Sixty-fourth Wisconsin Brigades of National Guardsmen, was formed at Waco, Tex., and recruited with men from various States until, when landed in France, in February, 1918, it reached approximately 20,000 men.

The division was stationed at various places in France and Alsace until the second battle of the Marne, when it was moved near Chateau-Thierry on the firing line to a point where the marines had fought the enemy to a standstill. Relieving the Third Division of Regulars on this sector, from July 30 to August 5, during seven days of continuous fighting the Thirty-second Division forced back the enemy until, on August 5, the German lines broke and never re-formed until they had fled across the Vesle River, and the city of Fismes was occupied by our boys in the onward march to victory.

Individual heroism that equaled the finest achievements of the Civil War were repeated again and again in that irresistible advance of the Thirty-second Division, described by French officers and German prisoners as the most desperate fighting they had seen during the war, Verdun and the Somme not excepted.

Of that battle Edwin L. James, New York Times war correspondent, says:

> One village changed hands nine times in the bitter contest between these boys from Wisconsin and Michigan and the German Jaegers and Prussian Guards. The title of "Les Terribles" has been bestowed on this division by the French.

Words of praise come from many writers, but one other comment, editorially, from the Chicago Tribune, alone is noted. Under the caption of "Les Terribles," the Tribune says:

> There was something more than gallantry to be credited to the Thirty-second Division, "Les Terribles," as these Wisconsin and Michigan fighters have been dubbed by their astonished French comrades. They have achieved the courage of the new-found republic, these soldiers, most of whom are the sons of German parents. * * * It is fateful that men one generation removed from the baneful influence of junkerdom should wield the sword that is to play such an important part in suppressing it. Their sturdy fathers and mothers in Wisconsin and Michigan are stoutly vindicated in the resolve for liberty, and they may justly take pride in the distinction that their sons are "Les Terribles."

It does not detract from the recognized bravery of other American soldiers or from the exploits of the French, the British, or other allies to praise the living and dead of the Thirty-second Division, because that is their due.

One of the regiments of the old Wisconsin Iron Brigade, which included other State regiments, lost one-half of its effective strength at Gettysburg, and that brigade has been glorified in song and story—it defeated a brave, whipped foe.

The sons and grandsons, the soldiers of this day and age, have maintained the record of their sires, for a company of the Sixty-fourth Brigade from Eau Claire, in my own district, went into action with 178 men on July 30 and came out with 74, while 5 of its 6 lieutenants were killed, wounded, or missing. Company C, of Hudson, which I organized many years ago in my little home city, also entered the battle with a full company and is reported to have come out with 30 men in charge of a mess sergeant. Other companies of the division were led by noncommissioned officers at the close of the final drive with their line officers killed, wounded, or missing.

In the entire division the casualties reached 4,100, or nearly 1 in 4 of those engaged. In the One hundred and twenty-eighth Wisconsin Regiment 750 casualties were reported, or about 1 in 3 of those engaged, while in the One hundred and twenty-seventh Wisconsin Regiment casualties reached 1,445 out of 2,400 men, including 76 per cent of its officers killed, wounded, or missing.

These figures were given me personally in Washington by two different men, both present at the battle. Tests of courage are not determined by losses in battle, but results gained are sometimes an index, and the Thirty-second Division of "Les Terribles," from Wisconsin and Michigan, gained its laurels through seven days of constant fighting midst rain and mud, charging across the open and through woods against machine guns and artillery, occasionally yielding to superior force, but, without faltering, driving on and on until the shock troops of the Thirtieth Prussian Guard were forced back a dozen miles across the Vesle, and our boys gained all their objectives and held them. [Applause.]

AMERICA'S SOLDIERS CAN NOT BE STOPPED.

According to one of the participants in the battle, who told me personally of the fact, a captured German captain who had been in the war since its beginning declared he could not understand how the advance was made in the face of the fire the Germans were directing, but the Thirty-second Division, as its men fell, closed up the ranks and drove on until their flag was carried to the river, and the finest shock troops of the enemy, broken and bewildered, had been captured or driven to the other side.

That is the spirit of the American soldier from every State, and that spirit will win the war.

Adjt. Gen. Holway, of Wisconsin, says that 40 per cent of Wisconsin's troops in that battle were of German parentage, and adds that while others were of Scandinavian, Irish, Polish, and New England blood they were all true American boys first, last, and always. [Applause.]

Let no man engage in cowardly insinuations about the loyalty or bravery of Wisconsin's men, young or old, at any time or place. Those who do so have their own miserable, selfish interests first at heart, and are as false and dangerous to the welfare of this country and of its people as are recognized traitors who receive deserved punishment.

Our soldiers abroad are winning the plaudits of both friend and foe for upholding the flag of their country during this war, as their fathers and their fathers' fathers did before them, and they send word back to us from across the water they have no time for political or lip patriots. Let those political patriots within my State who have declared Wisconsin sought to thwart the military program of the Nation and those who demanded military courts-martial for Wisconsin take heed, for such persistent poison-gas patriots who seek to divide our people will be scorned and scourged by honest men. Let youthful lip patriots who have joined in the same hue and cry now waive exemptions, shoulder their guns, and take the place of Wisconsin's gallant sons who fell at Chateau-Thierry. The service will make them good soldiers and better citizens and give them an understanding of the great debt of gratitude we owe our American boys in France. [Applause.]

BATTLES OF BULLETS AND BALLOTS.

I would conclude these remarks with this brief account of a battle of bullets, wherein the arrogant Hun has been driven back by Wisconsin and Michigan boys, but a further word is necessary regarding arrogant forces in our States and country that masquerade as "loyalists," "patriots," and "security" leaguers, and cover up their real aims by working upon the fears and prejudices of the public at large. Nothing is too sacred and no measures too cowardly for these men to employ when advancing their own selfish interests. The battle of bullets at Chateau-Thierry finds its political counterpart in the battle of ballots just waged in Wisconsin.

In the State primary, the Wall Street profiteering patriots of New York, linked with others of the same brand in Wisconsin, assumed their announced task of preserving the Nation's patriotism. In this effort they brought into the campaign all of the 100 per cent personal enemies of my colleagues from Wisconsin, reenforced by all the old machine-gun politicians, profiteering patriots, and a fine line of ambitious, shock-proof candidates, all attacking under a "loyalty" camouflage. For ammunition they used carloads of misrepresentation, poison-gas slanders, and alternated appeals to prejudice and patriotism that found lodgment in the minds of men who had not the time to investigate if they had the inclination to ascertain the truth. My colleague, Mr. COOPER, has presented for your inspection a sample of cowardly slanders put forth against him.

Mr. Speaker, an insolent letter received by Representatives in Congress from the "Security" League of New York, with an impudent questionnaire, comes from an organization that has prostituted the name "Americanism" in its efforts to defeat Congressmen. Its letterhead carries the names of Elihu Root and Alton B. Parker to give character. I will not discuss undenied public reports that one of its sponsors hired a substitute during the Civil War and his Americanism may be measured by the price paid for that service.

Mr. COX. What is the name of that man?

Mr. FREAR. I will not discuss that now. His name is known to the country.

Another sponsor for this libelous league was snowed under in a popular election a few years ago by over two and one-half million voters because of his alleged subserviency to Wall Street and on a platform demanding "a reduction of the Army," which then numbered about 25,000 men.

This is no time for recrimination, but the days are too critical for a selfish, war-profiteering league to denounce as "disloyal" practically 90 per cent of the membership of this House who have been praised by the President in repeated messages for their patriotism, and to traduce 47 of the 48 States. That charge against the President would lodge the slanderers in Leavenworth. Against the Supreme Court it would mean criminal-contempt proceedings. Directed against a coordinate branch of the Government, a part of the greatest legislative body in the world, during these hours of national stress and peril, it invites active prosecutions by the Attorney General's department.

No one charge since the beginning of the war has given more aid and comfort to the enemy than the infamous libel that this House individually or collectively is 90 per cent disloyal for voting its convictions, under its oath of office, either prior to or since the declaration of war. The jurisdiction of the House as to its own membership is supreme, and ino rder that the election activities of this league may be reached I have offered a resolution of inquiry, which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read:

House Resolution 435.

Whereas the National Security League, a self-constituted political body, has given to the press of the country an infamous screed wherein practically 90 per cent of the Representatives of the House are publicly branded before the world as disloyal men; and

Whereas the National Security League has caused to be widely published a statement of self-determined percentages of patriotism, computed under its authority, wherein 47 States of the Union are rated disloyal, based on such votes and computations; and

Whereas charges have been publicly made that this "league" has expended large sums of money, reaching $1,000,000 or more, in carrying on its propaganda, and in its active efforts to defeat Members of Congress under a cloak of "loyalty" and that such expenditures are made contrary to the Federal corrupt-practices act; and

Whereas said "league" has been publicly charged with being composed of and financed by war profiteers living in New York and elsewhere and inspired by corrupt purposes unrelated to loyalty.

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House be empowered and instructed to bring before it the officers and directors of the National Security League and such members and witnesses as may have knowledge of its activities and ascertain what efforts have been made to improperly influence the election or defeat of Representatives in Congress, the persons contributing to such funds, the amount of such contributions, and purposes for which contributed and expended, together with all violations of the corrupt-practices act affecting election expenditures and all other proper information. That the committee is authorized and empowered to issue subpœnas, swear and examine witnesses, and to procure all documents bearing upon the matters referred to, and to employ needed stenographers and clerks in the prosecution of such inquiry.

The "Security League" flag waved by Elihu Root and acting patriot Alton Parker, of Wall Street, carries a political skull and crossbones ostensibly over eight barred votes in Congress, of which six are prior to the war, and become the "Security" League's test of loyalty. The character and effect of these votes it brazenly misrepresents. Only 47 Members of Congress, according to the profiteering patriots of Wall Street, out of over 400 Members are strictly pure men, fit to stand with Root and Parker, and of the 47 perfect patriots only 4 are Democrats. All of the remaining 350 Members of Congress, or more, are subjected to poisoned-gas attacks from this "league" through the public press.

CONGRESS DOES NOT REPORT TO WALL STREET.

Our honored Speaker, CHAMP CLARK, can not wear the cross carried by the Root-Parker Wall Street patriots, because he and all the rest of the Missouri delegation fail in the "acid test" which has been published far and wide by a sensational press. Neither can the league's tin cross be tied on Leaders KITCHIN nor MANN, nor LENROOT, nor MOORE, nor DENT, nor DIES, nor FORDNEY, nor FITZGERALD, nor FOSTER; they do not measure up with patriots Root and Parker. The Wall Street published blacklist includes RAINEY and DOREMUS, official bell weathers; and SISSON and STEPHENS, of Mississippi; and SHALLENBERGER and STEPHENS, of Nebraska; and CAMPBELL, of Kansas. FERRIS and FESS, our national chairmen, are both unpatriotic according to Wall Street profiteers, who include also in the procribed list KITCHIN, and KAHN, and KENT, and KINKAID, and KETTNER, and KEATING, and KNUTSON, and KING, and KINCHELOE. LEVER and HAUGEN get the hook. MOON is under a cloud, CHURCH can not get across, and CROSSER gets nowhere. What is in a name when GOOD is in bad. DOOLITTLE does too much, WISE belies his name, STERLING is spurious, RUBEY off color, and GREENE, BROWNE, WHITE, and BLACK are termed yellow by the Root-Parker Wall Street patriots? [Laughter.]

Judges CRISP, BYRNS and BYRNES and BURNETT are roasted to a turn, while CANDLER, of the Tombigbee; both HULLS, of Tennessee and Iowa; hard-hitting HUDDLESTON, LANGLEY, MEEKER, DECKER, DYER, RODENBERG, and REAVIS, all patriotic orators and statesmen; and GARRETT, SAUNDERS, STAFFORD, SIMS, TOWNER, TEMPLE, and ESCH, parliamentarians and efficient legislators of recognized fame, with 300 other Representatives in Congress, all fall by the wayside in their Americanism.

According to the Root-Parker Insecurity League of Wall Street, the only State with a perfect loyalty record is Rhode Island, the smallest. All the remaining 47 States are "disloyal," according to this arrogant league. [Laughter.] Wyoming is wrong 75 per cent, according to these tin-cross patriots, because, in their opinion, MONDELL, the whole delegation, is three-fourths imperfect. Nevada is 50–50 American because of Representative ROBERTS, and Texas as 66.67 per cent, or almost exactly two-thirds, bad. Missouri, the home of our distinguished Speaker, is rated 50–50 per cent disloyal by Root and Parker, and Pennsylvania is mathematically 31.94 per cent un-American. California, the home of KAHN, gets the bad rating of 43.86 per cent; Colorado, the home of KEATING, is 78.12 below loyalty freezing point [laughter]; and Wisconsin is 70 per cent under par. North Carolina, with WEBB, SMALL, and KITCHIN, is found to be 56.25 per cent unpatriotic, and Iowa, that gave to her country many of the famous Rainbow Division, is precisely 64.77 per cent disloyal. New York, the home of the only Root and only Parker and only "Security" League, is 150,000 per cent bad and hopeless, because that figure represents Hylan's enormous majority in the "loyalty" fight made against him by the Root-Parker league. [Laughter.] New York's batting average in Washington, when removed from Root and Parker's patriotic influence, is fixed at only 15.11 per cent disloyal.

North Dakota is rated as 79.16 per cent hopeless, while Indiana, the migratory home of Marshall, Vice President and patriotic exemplar, is knocked down as a cheap patriotic substitute at 52.88 per cent of the real thing. Illinois hits the cellar stairs with all of its 27 Representatives excepting Foss, but including CANNON, MADDEN, and MANN, and assays 39.81 per cent disloyal; and Ohio, the State of Presidents Hayes, Garfield, and McKinley, and of Gen. SHERWOOD, GARD and LONGWORTH, is plastered over by the Root-Parker league with 55.67 per cent disloyalty mud.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; for a question.

Mr. PLATT. There is no disloyalty in the charge of the Security League.

Mr. FREAR. When they figure up the percentage of loyalty and Americanism there is a distinct charge of disloyalty, and New York is one of the worst, measured by the result of Hylan's election when he snowed under the Root-Parker League. [Laughter and applause.]

These are the official figures given to the press of the country, to our allies, and to the Kaiser by the Wall Street profiteering patriots. By careful computation they have ascertained only 47 Congressmen are fit company for a league that indicts the House of Representatives and all the States excepting Rhode Island.

WALL STREET LEAGUE ENTERS WISCONSIN PRIMARIES.

The league's activities were felt in the recent Wisconsin primaries where three of my colleagues received the double cross from the league instead of the tin article, and less than 200 votes out of approximately 20,000 votes cast in each of the three districts spelt defeat in each case. In other words, between 49 and 50 per cent of the voters in three Wisconsin districts, whose boys were yet fighting near Chateau-Thierry, gave their support to my colleagues—COOPER, NELSON, and CARY—but the Root and Parker poison was enough to deceive and defeat them. Three-cornered fights were variously interpreted, but where thousands of Democrats were urged by insecurity leagues at home and abroad to help defeat my colleagues in Republican primaries, the result is easily explained. In Mr. NELSON'S district and in others not 10 per cent of the Democratic vote was saved with which to qualify the Democratic candidate, because all participated in Republican primaries.

A brief word regarding the harvest of hate fostered and garnered by the political and business patriots who thus seek to determine the loyalty and Americanism of Congress and of the country, measured by their own yardsticks: With headquarters in New York City, they were whipped out of their boots while trying to defeat Hylan in a Democratic scrap on the "loyalty" issue. He won out by 150,000 majority, although $2,000,000 was spent to defeat him, and practically every New York paper opposed him. The next league fight was against LENROOT in the Wisconsin senatorial election. Although aided by the Democratic administration, the verdict went to LENROOT by a people who are as patriotic as any in the country. In the Minnesota primaries four Members were marked for defeat, but when returns came in it was discovered VAN DYKE, a Democrat, had been unopposed; two Republicans, DAVIS and KNUTSON, won out overwhelmingly against their "loyalty" opponents by a combined plurality of 18,000; and the fourth Member was defeated in a many-cornered fight. Iowa returned every man who was opposed on the "loyalty" issue excepting one, who patriotically stuck on the job at Washington, and thus gave his detractors a clear field.

In Nebraska with a 75 per cent disloyal insecurity league estimate no opposition could be aroused and all Members were returned, so far as the "loyalty" issue was concerned. In Wisconsin three Members were unopposed, three were renominated over three security league perfect patriots, and three were defeated by close votes, running from 79 to 180, or less than one-half of 1 per cent of the vote cast.

In Illinois all of the Representatives proscribed by the Wall Street tin-cross decorators won renominations. The only one who failed was a solitary Member the insecurity league approved. I have made no effort to present a list of those who have been renominated over the dishonest and wickedly false issue which attracted political profiteers in many districts, but it is safe to say that 90 per cent of the proscribed Members are renominated. The country repudiated the infamous charge of disloyalty, but such libelous charges can not be made without corresponding responsibilities.

What the country has a right to know is why the Root-Parker political patriots of New York made these charges and why they failed to oppose leading Democratic Congressmen like KITCHIN and SHERWOOD and VAN DYKE, who voted against war, and yet struck at LENROOT's loyalty. They attacked LENROOT in the senatorial campaign with bitter and malicious falsehoods and dishonest half truths, but now sheathe their poisoned arrows when Ford runs for Democratic Senator in Michigan with the President's approval. Yet Ford was the leader of the pacifists before war was declared.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. For a question.

Mr. MEEKER. I have written the Security League asking them why socialism is rampant in New York and dead in Missouri. Can the gentleman explain that?

Mr. FREAR. These men in New York are making socialism popular by reason of their own arrogance. I thank the gentleman.

The political patriots violently assailed my colleague, Mr. COOPER, with his 26 years of honorable legislative service, as he related to the House last week, and yet the public slanderers remained silent as to Mr. KITCHIN, who happens to be equally distinguished and equally proscribed, but is a Democrat.

They fired all their heavy artillery at my colleague Mr. NELSON, who has two sons in service, and they sent a cloud of poisoned gas into my own district when my only son was yet under fire with the Thirty-second Division near Chateau-Thierry. Yet these political patriots and purveyors of slander made no move to defeat VAN DYKE, a good Democrat, across the river from my district in Minnesota, although his votes were cast with mine, and Minnesota was published by these libelers of States as being 63.75 per cent disloyal.

I am not criticizing those of the opposite party who escape the direct attacks of the poison-gas profiteers with headquarters in New York and branch offices in Milwaukee and elsewhere. My Democratic friends are as loyal as Root or Parker, even though only three Democrats of the House are recommended for the insecurity league's cross. But I call attention to the fact that these New York superpatriots dare not oppose Ford, KITCHIN, SHERWOOD, VAN DYKE, or others, because if so the administration would tear off their hypocritical masks. So they expect to snipe away in close Republican districts of the North in November and parade their efforts while posing in the limelight. An adjunct of Democracy in Wisconsin, Indiana, New Hampshire, New York, Maine, Minnesota, and throughout the North, their poisoned-gas machines appear to be spiked against Democrats, North or South. No political post-mortem is here proposed, but the approaching general election fixes attention on the methods of these Wall Street patriots who are now aiding the administration's efforts to capture the next Senate and House.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe that President Taft is one of the several vice presidents of the Security League.

Mr. FREAR. No; his name is not mentioned. The gentleman from Alabama and I are rated by the Root and Parker crowd as un-American, with 350 other Members of Congress. There is no politics in this; they reject all excepting 43 Republicans and 4 Democrats. I ask to investigate these investigators and promise interesting results.

They seek, apparently, to divide Republicans in the North and next to defeat the nominees. No opposition occurs in the South. Poison-gas attacks are made under a "loyalty" cloak, and as an evidence of the method of base misrepresentation put forth in Wisconsin—too late for reply—I offer a malicious folder, similar to that put forth in many other districts, circulated in my own district a week before the primary, entitled "FREAR's record in Congress." The people of the district repudiated the folder and its authors by an overwhelming vote, but that in no way affects the necessity for exposing its half truths and general falsity, which are a fair sample of attacks in other districts.

FALSE CHARGES AGAINST FREAR'S RECORD IN CONGRESS.

The first charge reads, "An abuse of the franking privilege." This charge, also made in other districts, is based upon a brief four-page statement when defending my legislative record and exposing my detractors. A few men met in my district, inspired by the Root-Parker type of patriots, and, acting under a hypocritical cloak of superloyalty, criticized my votes in Congress. The same charge was repeated by two or three papers of the district. Compelled to remain in Washington because of official duties here, the only way to acquaint my constituents with the falsity of charges against my record was by giving an immediate and correct statement of facts in reply. No intelligent critic questions this personal right and privilege or that the leave to print was properly granted by the House, as in thousands of cases, or the rule under which granted. Time has been generously given me by the House in debates and general discussion, but where 400 Members are equally entitled to the floor, limited time necessitated the rule for extending remarks in matters of similar character.

The remarks were printed at my own expense and sent out as all other remarks are sent. Only petty dishonest opposition would misrepresent the parliamentary practice or House rule or fact that I fully complied with all, as shown by the record. I have endeavored to actively help in saving a hundred million dollars or more through the defeat or reduction of wasteful bills in Congress, and no honest critic believes I would seek to save a few dollars postage in sending out matter not strictly frankable. If so, the remedy is plain by presenting the matter to the House.

Two or three petty newspapers have repeated the false charge about franking privileges by Congressmen. Our constituents have a right to know our attitude on public questions and national legislation, but I do not care to defend a wise law or proper practice at this time. I do desire to call attention to the fact not generally known that newspapers known as "publications of the second class" are carried by the Government through the mails free of charge to all subscribers residing in the county where published, under section 433, postal laws.

Without that privilege thousands of weekly papers would be compelled to suspend, because their subscribers would not pay the additional postage. The average small weekly probably averages 52,000 copies annually which are carried in the mails free of charge throughout the year. This loss or expense to the Government contributes largely toward the $70,000,000 annual shortage in second-class postage revenues.

Carriage at expense of the Government of these papers must be justified, if at all, on grounds of educational value; but constant misrepresentation and slanders week after week by unscrupulous scribblers, in papers carried free by the Government, is neither educational nor just to the people. When such men question the franking privilege given Congress and yet owe their own livelihood to free carriage daily or weekly by the Government of their papers, their dishonesty and hypocrisy merit public contempt.

The "first" charge contained in the folder on the war record is that I voted against the McLemore resolution in 1916, long before war was declared. KITCHIN, MANN, CANNON, LENROOT, and 138 other patriotic Members voted against tabling the resolution. GRAY, KEATING, KENT, and other Democrats so voted and were praised and supported by the President, who yet bitterly criticized LENROOT for voting the same way. That vote was cast back in 1916, and later that same year I was elected by 14,000 majority. The charge as made is a deliberate, dishonest effort to misrepresent the character of the resolution, the effect of the vote, and the purpose of those so voting.

The "fourth" charge, that I voted against war, again includes Leader KITCHIN, Gen. SHERWOOD, VAN DYKE, and other Democrats and Republicans who had no opposition in the recent primaries. Washington, Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, Lloyd-George, and other national leaders of this and other countries could be equally assailed if this charge is tenable and would be debarred from wearing the Root-Parker cross of tin. Henry Ford, leader of the pacifists, now finds Executive approval, although his pre-war record was based on financing peace measures to prevent war. These facts are concealed and the charge is willfully distorted.

The "fifth" charge, that "FREAR voted against conscription," is unqualifiedly false. With Speaker CLARK, Leader KITCHIN, and over a hundred other Members, I voted to permit volunteering, but the provision recommended by the committee gave the President power to conscript if he found it necessary to do so. I voted for the amended conscription bill after the volunteer provision was stricken out, and voted for the completed bill. This libel is continuously reiterated by Security League slanderers in the name of "patriotism."

The "ninth" charge says that "FREAR led the fight to eliminate the nitrate provision, a most important measure." The last part of the statement again is willfully false and mendacious.

I am here credited with leading the fight against the Muscle Shoals $20,000,000 private water-power joker contained in a bill before the war. The purpose of the fight was to prevent an enormous steal from the Federal Treasury under a false pretense, and the entire Congress, House and Senate, was equally responsible for results because, when the fraud was exposed, it was stricken from the bill and kept out by both the Houses of Congress. Instead of receiving credit for preventing the steal, these profiteering patriots in New York and Wisconsin abuse me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman understands that only within the last few weeks the War Department has declared that the dam at Muscle Shoals is a nonessential and ordered work suspended during the course of the war.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman; he really led in the last fight against the Muscle Shoals proposition this session, although both of us voted for the proposition rather than be put in the light of voting against a war measure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We voted for every measure for making nitrates, but we voted against establishing a water-power site that we knew could not be used within four years.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Ohio is correct.

The same lying folder next says of charges in court made against L. B. Nagler:

Mr. FREAR testified that Nagler's reputation for loyalty was good. The jury did not agree with Mr. FREAR'S idea of loyalty and promptly found Mr. Nagler guilty.

Again the cowardly authors of the folder sought to prejudice minds at the eleventh hour by a malicious lie uttered knowingly, too late for reply. The undisputed facts are that the Federal court subpœnaed Justice Owen, of the State supreme court, Secretary of State Hull, State Treasurer Johnson, and myself to testify regarding Mr. Nagler's reputation "prior to the charges contained in the indictment." Mr. Nagler had been assistant secretary of state under three secretaries for a period covering many years, and all testified his reputation was good at the time covered by the question so far as known. I was singled out by a blackmailing folder that unsuccessfully sought to prejudice votes as to my loyalty by misrepresenting my testimony. This was done in the name of "patriotism." Other false charges in the folder and half truths issued at the last moment and circulated by my opponents through the district were too late to answer. In the primary the voters repudiated the folder and the character assassins who helped in its circulation, and I carried seven out of the nine counties with over 4,000 plurality over my nearest opponent, with a good vote over all, and received the largest indorsement ever given by my home county in all my years of public life. I am content with the verdict.

My reply to poisoned-gas attacks is that since the declaration of war I have voted for every measure passed by Congress, over 100 in number, for the prosecution of the war, and shall continue to do so. My Americanism may be measured by the fact that my father, his father before him, my only son, and I have each worn Uncle Sam's uniform in actual service, and I am ready to do so again if need be. Political and business war profiteers may misrepresent, and powerful organizations acting under a cloak of "loyalty" may deceive, but Congress and the States will not be made the creatures of any Root-Parker league so long as the people rule.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to revamp issues when once decided, but, while I have no fears personally of the result in November, I can not remain silent when the poison-gas brigade in New York, Milwaukee, and in my own district assails my Americanism.

Loyalty to our country is universal with men on both sides of the aisle in this House, and some of the kindest words of encouragement that have come to me since the Wisconsin primary are from Democratic friends. We are united in the effort to win the war, and all are supporting the President in that resolve. Efforts to revive the Kaiser bugaboo will mislead no one, because at the present moment the Kaiser is kept busy with other pressing matters over there and can not be worked overtime over here for the coming elections. Lip patriots and poison-gas leagues have no place in politics at this time. After the war is over the greatest legislative problems that have confronted the country for a half century must be decided. The people will register their will in November based upon the political, economic, and constructive records of men and of parties, and they know that a united Congress and country will support the war to a victorious conclusion, for in that purpose there can be no division. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

Bearing on the loyalty of and substantial service rendered by Congress, I submit the estimate of two distinguished statesmen—one the President of the United States; the other a man who came near reaching that same goal, but who is equally great as the able Presiding Officer of the House of Representatives of the United States.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S STATEMENT.

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose I believe it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the Army and the Navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the Nation effective.

I believe that it has also in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the consideration of social justice, so often obscured in the hasty readjustments of such a crisis.

It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly, but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

SPEAKER CLARK'S STATEMENT TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I congratulate you on the ending of the most important session of Congress in the history of the Republic. The amount of business that we have transacted is absolutely amazing and stupendous. I think every Member of this House has contributed all that was in him to the support of the Government of the United States in this great emergency. So far as I have been able to observe—and I have observed very closely—partisan politics have been temporarily banished from this House.

I think every man has given the utmost of patriotism to his service here. I doubt very much whether any other Congress from now until the day of judgment will ever vote as much money in one session as we have voted; I hope not. Every dollar that the departments have asked, or the President has made it appear they needed, they have got, and the Sixty-fifth Congress has deserved well of the country.

THE JUDGES AND THEIR INSPIRATION.

Eight measures to determine the loyalty of Congressmen and of the States, used by the defender of Boss Tweed, and a discredited presidential aspirant who ran on a party platform in 1904 favoring a "reduction of the Army." No. 1. Tabling the McLemore resolution, March 7, 1916. No. 2. Kahn amendment to the committee Army bill, April 18, 1916. No. 3. Brandegee Senate amendment to the Army bill, April 18, 1916. No. 4. Providing for a volunteer reserve under Federal control. April 13, 1916. No. 5. To recommit naval bill, June 2, 1916. No. 6. Amendment as to American ships carrying arms or ammunition—all before war. No. 7. Declaration of War, April 5, 1917. No. 8. Kahn amendment on conscription, April 23, 1917.

THE INSOLENT QUESTIONNAIRE.

The "Security" League gets whatever standing it has obtained from its two "honorary presidents." Its "congressional committee chairman," who finds Chairmen FERRIS and FESS lacking in Americanism, speaking for patriots Root and Parker, says to every candidate for Congress, the questionnaire will be given "country-wide publicity," thanks to a security-league controlled press that has lampooned Congress in the past and is confidently expected to continue that task of "patriotism."

THE NATIONAL SECURITY LEAGUE (INC.),
CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE,
New York, September 18, 1918.

DEAR SIR: We take the liberty of handing you inclosed two blank forms of a "questionnaire" which is being submitted to every official candidate for Congress and to which we trust you will reply in due course.

In sending this to you it is proper that we should explain that the work of this committee is a strictly nonpartisan endeavor to assist in the election to Congress of candidates whose Americanism is unquestioned and who possess the character, ability, and capacity that qualify them for the office.

This committee does not set itself up as a judge of candidates. Its scope is merely to record and publish facts and to do so according to well-defined principles and rules from which there will be no deviation in favor of or against any individual or of any party.

A digest of the replies to the "questionnaire" will be given country-wide publicity.

Very truly, yours,

CHAS. D. ORTH,
Chairman Congressional Committee.

[Elihu Root, honorary president; Alton B. Parker, honorary vice president; Charles E. Lydecker, president; Henry L. West, executive secretary. Telephone, Murray Hill 9145.]

THE NATIONAL SECURITY LEAGUE (INC.),
19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York.

CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE (CHARLES D. ORTH, CHAIRMAN).

QUESTIONNAIRE.

The work of this committee is strictly nonpartisan.

This questionnaire is being addressed to the nominees to Congress of every party. The replies will be carefully examined and compiled for publication.

Two blanks are sent to enable candidates to preserve a copy of their reply.

If replies are not received within a period equal to mail time plus 10 days, it will be regarded as a declination to respond, in which case the committee will send copies of the questionnaire to friends and opponents of the candidate for the purpose of securing the best available data.

1. Name.
2. Residence address.
3. Business address.
4. Present occupation.
5. Occupations for the past 15 years.
6. What public offices previously held?
7. (a) What has been the candidate's position since July, 1914, on preparedness?
   (b) In what way is the candidate directly on record as expressing these views?
   (c) Is the candidate's present position the same as given in answer to (a)?
8. (a) What was the candidate's viewpoint about the United States entering the war prior to the declaration of war, April 5, 1917?
   (b) What record exists embodying these views?
   (c) Have the candidate's views since changed regarding the participation of the United States in the war?

CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE "LEAGUE."

A congressional investigation of membership of the "Root-Parker league," its contributors, contributions, and expenditures, will disclose the truth or falsity of an oft-repeated statement that the league is financed by war profiteers, including especially munition makers, and that the object of attacks is not related to patriotism.

The purpose of the resolution introduced, primarily, is to ascertain whether charges made by the league, that would be criminal if made against the President, and grounds of impeachment if made against the Supreme Court, are not equally grounds of contempt when made against a coordinate branch of the Government by an ex-United States Republican Senator and a disappointed Democratic politician, whose own past records would be of service in determining purity of intentions.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read a letter which I received this morning from an esteemed constituent. It is as follows:

NORTH ADAMS, MASS., September 20, 1918.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find circular and letter to me from the Review of Reviews Co., seeking subscription for the magazine, and offering 2,000 Questions and Answers About the War as a premium. I understand that this book is full of German propaganda; and if it is so, why does not the Government suppress such work, which is conducted through the mail?

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

The circular letter from the magazine Review of Reviews contains an extract from the volume. It contains an indorsement by Mr. George Creel, the chairman of the Committee on Public Information, of the volume which, I understand, later he found it wise to withdraw. But be that as it may, it seems to me such a propaganda as this ought to be called to the attention of the proper postal authorities in order that our mail shall not be used for such purposes. I submit the letter I have received for the purpose of calling it to the attention of the department in this way.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman give us the date of the letter?

Mr. TREADWAY. September 20.

Mr. DECKER. I mean of the circular.

Mr. TREADWAY. It has no date; it bears the postmark of New York. The envelope contains the question, "Did the Germans warn the passengers on the Lusitania?" a very inappropriate question to attract the attention of persons receiving it in the mail.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to state for the gentleman's benefit that at least two weeks ago the Review of Reviews stopped the publication of that book, and that fact has been announced in all the newspapers of the country. The Government stopped it at least two weeks ago.

Mr. TREADWAY. The publication of the book may have been stopped; I know nothing as to that, but it is being circulated at the present time, and evidence is submitted here to that effect.

Mr. DECKER. I would state with due respect that that is the reason I wanted the gentleman to state the date of the letter. I think the gentleman has been sent a letter at least two weeks old.

Mr. TREADWAY. I doubt that, but if it is two weeks old, it is the fault of the Post Office Department in not dating their mail when they stamp it. This bears the postmark of New York City, and if the envelope is not new, it certainly ought to show when it was put in the mail by the Review of Reviews. The Post Office Department is at fault in allowing the circulation of such a publication at any time. It is my opinion that my constituent sent me the circular as soon as he received it.

TRADE-MARKS AND COMMERCIAL NAMES.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request to have a rereference of the bill (S. 4889) from the Committee on Patents to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I made this request once before. This is a department bill and was introduced in the Senate and also in the House and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House and to the Committee on Commerce in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill about?

Mr. SIMS. It is a bill with reference to putting into effect provisions of the treaty with respect to trade-marks and patents in South American countries. The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Patents [Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH], is present. I have spoken to him about the matter, and he has no objection to this request.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from New York make a statement in respect to the matter.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, this bill was originally introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee considered the bill for some time. The bill was passed by the Senate, and it was sent to his committee. Under the circumstances, as chairman of the Committee on Patents, I have no objection to having the Senate bill sent to the same committee, which has considered an identical House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOOD. To submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that I may have the privilege of addressing the House to-morrow for 20 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, that I may have 20 minutes after the gentleman from Iowa to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks leave to address the House for 20 minutes after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if it is in order, we want to take up the emergency power bill. There has already been a rule reported, and I do not want to make a unanimous-consent agreement——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is another bill that has a privileged status coming up before the power bill. The rule is ready, so I serve notice on the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SIMS. I object, if it delays either one of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make a conditional objection. It is either yes or no.

Mr. SIMS. Then I object, for the first time in my life.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects. The gentleman from Alabama wanted to speak after the speech of the gentleman from Iowa, and of the gentleman from Iowa can not get to speak the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request if the gentlemen want to take up this legislation. I just wanted an opportunity to reply to what the gentleman from Iowa might say if he spoke.

Mr. GOOD. I desire to speak on the subject of campaign contributions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request has already been objected to.

Mr. GOOD. May I ask who objected to the request?

Mr. SIMS. I objected solely on the ground it would defer action on this bill. I have no other objection to the gentleman speaking.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will lose more than 20 minutes on the other bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. DYER. I object to the request of the gentleman from Alabama and also to that of the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has not preferred any request and that is surplusage.

Mr. DYER. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his objection?

Mr. DYER. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Iowa speaking?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I object, and I am going to stand hitched to it.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 11945).

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. And pending that motion I want to arrive, if I can, at some agreement with reference to general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill first.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa what he suggests in reference to general debate on these amendments?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, we have several requests, and we think we should have an hour and a half on this side, at least. The requests are coming in pretty rapidly here, and I think we had better have at least two hours on this side.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It looks to me like we ought to get along with an hour on a side in reference to this matter in general debate. There are a good many amendments to be considered.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I have not preferred a request; we are trying to arrive at something on which to base a request for time.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not made any request; he is trying to make a request.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I was trying to get some basis upon which to make the request.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. In order that we may get some basis to arrive at, I will suggest an hour on a side.

Mr. SABATH. What do I understand by an hour on a side?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. An hour on this side and an hour on that side for the purpose of general debate.

Mr. SABATH. Where will we on this side who are opposed to the bill receive our time?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. We will endeavor to take care of you gentlemen on this side.

Mr. SABATH. We are against the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have a number of gentlemen on this side who desire time, and they would have to be cut down considerably. The gentleman is aware of what took place here a minute ago; and with some speakers to-morrow, in order to expedite the passage of this bill——

Mr. LEVER. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that this side has very little requests for time; most of it comes from the other side. It seems to me that we might get along with an hour and a half. What does the gentleman think of an hour and a half; will that be sufficient?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have requests for more than two hours, and I think they are entitled to it. I do not think we could get through with any shorter time.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman will expedite the passage of his bill by allowing liberal time for debate.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman ought to find out who is for and against and divide the time that way. This is a matter we are all interested in. This side and that side the gentleman says is trying to divide the time. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. HAUGEN. There are a number of questions involved. I take it Members will be for a number of amendments and against others, and that it will be impossible to divide the time in that way, but we ought to give sufficient time.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois he has in mind one amendment of the Senate, but there are thirty-odd amendments there.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the most important amendment that I have in mind.

Mr. SABATH. You mean the confiscation amendment?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any request to make. All of this talk is out of order.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that we take an hour and a half on a side.

Mr. HAUGEN. I can not possibly get through with that. If I can get through with two hours, that is the very best I can do.

Mr. CANNON. Do you propose to have some debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. LEVER. It would be in order to have debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are many important Senate amendments to this bill, as the gentleman has just suggested. The debate will apply to some extent to a number of those amendments. The prohibition amendment is a very important one, but there are other amendments to the bill that gentlemen desire to discuss, and altogether they will take a considerable amount of time, and I am sure that at least two hours will be needed on this side of the Hall by gentlemen for and against it.

I assume, of course, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], if he has charge of the time, will divide the time equitably and fair on this side, as I am sure it will be so divided on that side. Two hours on a side, or at least two hours on this side, is about the least time in which the matter could be disposed of.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will it be largely confined to the amendments to this bill or to other matters?

Mr. MONDELL. Altogether to this bill.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that general debate be fixed at four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and two hours to be controlled by myself on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] asks unanimous consent that general debate be confined to four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if part of the two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] will be divided among those who are opposed to some of the amendments in the bill?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It will be divided equitably in consideration of the number of amendments that are pending. As stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] awhile ago, there are thirty and odd amendments here. We can not allot any great part of the time to the discussion of one amendment when there are a great many other amendments.

Mr. SABATH. I appreciate that. Nevertheless, there is one amendment which is of great importance, which attempts to eliminate and confiscate millions and millions of dollars worth of property.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman fom South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] for four hours general debate, two hours on a side?

Mr. DYER. Unless I can obtain some information from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], I shall be compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 11.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen, one from Missouri and one from New York, make the point of no quorum, and evidently there is none.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 257, nays 29, answered "present" 1, not voting 144, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER with Mr. STERLING of Illinois.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 11945. The Clerk will report the title of the bill and the Senate amendments in their order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition under general debate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. LEVER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will indulge me for a moment——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman for a question——

Mr. LEVER. I think we can expedite this thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin yielded the floor?

Mr. STAFFORD. By no means. I yielded for a question.

Mr. LEVER. It is a little bit more than a question. I am satisfied that we can pass this bill this afternoon if we will all make up our minds to do it. Personally I have no reason for wanting to hurry this matter through, but there are a number of gentlemen here who have their primaries on to-morrow, who have their reservations bought, and who expect to leave here to-night. I have been trying to arrange matters so that these could leave the city and yet have an opportunity to vote on this important bill. It is my intention to allow the first paragraph of this bill to be read and then to move that the committee rise, with a view to seeing if we could not reach some agreement as to general debate. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, and my colleagues on this side are willing, that liberal debate shall be had on this bill. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that two hours to a side be given. That would enable us to finish this bill by half past 6 or 7 and avoid the difficulty and the jam in which we find ourselves. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me to try out that procedure I will do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the original plan suggested by the gentleman of having two hours on a side for general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. If the gentleman wishes to move that the committee do now rise, and will state that on getting into the House he will move to close debate in two hours on a side, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that unanimous consent be granted to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] for 20 minutes to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. I will undertake to get, after we get back to the House, 20 minutes to-morrow for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] on the condition that my colleague from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] shall have a like amount of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman move, when we get back to the House, to close debate in four hours, two hours on a side, or ask it by unanimous consent?

Mr. LEVER. I will try to get unanimous consent. If I can not get it, I will move to close debate in four hours' time, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Ought there not to be included in the gentleman's request a motion or provision that the vote be taken at a certain time?

Mr. LEVER. That is almost impossible. I have no idea that we will have any trouble in getting the five-minute debate. I ask unanimous consent that the first section of the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment, page 2——

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman was going to move to rise.

Mr. LEVER. We have to read first.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not yield the floor for that purpose. The status of the parliamentary situation was that I or any other Member of the House was entitled to one hour for general debate.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11945; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to four hours, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to control two hours and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] to control two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate on these Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 11945 be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] and two hours by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. Is there objection?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I object, Mr. Speaker. I move that the House consume one hour——

Mr. IGOE. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker, if there is objection made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] moves that the general debate on these amendments be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, you can not include the control of the time.

The SPEAKER. No; that is not in it.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Speaker, put the question of going into Committee of the Whole. I ask unanimous consent that the time fixed shall be divided, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and two hours by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the four hours agreed upon be divided half and half between the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is this general debate to be confined to the bill?

The SPEAKER. There is no rule or agreement in relation to it. As it stands it is like any other general debate.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, let me submit another unanimous-consent request in order to save time. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] desires to address the House for 20 minutes to-morrow immediately after reading the Journal and clearing up business on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that after matters are disposed of on the Speaker's desk the gentleman from Iowa may address the House for 20 minutes and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] may address the House for 20 minutes if he desires.

The SPEAKER. As soon as these other matters are out of the way the Chair will put the request.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether this debate is to be limited to the bill or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it ought to be limited to the bill.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair desires to ascertain is whether there is objection to the division of the four hours in accordance with the request of the gentleman from South Carolina. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from South Carolina preferred another request, that to-morrow after the reading of the Journal and clearing up the business on the Speaker's table the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate amendment 13 to the bill H. R. 11945.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, during all the days of my life I have been a firm believer in temperance; not alone temperance in the use of liquor, but temperance in the use of food. The doctors tell us that every year 600,000 people in this country dig their graves with their teeth by overeating. I believe, too, that intemperance in exercise leads to the breaking down of the physical tissues, and is bad. But in my opinion prohibition will never cure the liquor evil. On the contrary, I believe it will bring about infinitely worse evils than the liquor evil. There are in this country to-day 1,500,000 authenticated "dope" fiends, men and women who take cocaine, morphine, heroin, caffeine, or some other habit-forming narcotics or drugs. In the administration of the first draft law 80,000 men between the ages of 21 and 31 years were rejected because they were "dope fiends." That is, enough men to form two divisions of the American Army. It is enough men to form about seven divisions of the Germany Army. It is a remarkable thing that with prohibition legislation being enacted all over this country the use of poisonous, habit-forming drugs is increasing by leaps and bounds. I attribute it in a large measure to the effect of prohibition legislation.

The man who wants a mild stimulant, the man who wants a glass of beer or of light wine and finds he can not get it will go to one of the drug stores, or possibly a grocery store, and buy some of these remedies which I have here on display on this desk. He will get 47 per cent of alcohol mixed with a little opium by taking this concoction, and after a while he becomes an avowed drug or "dope fiend."

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the National Anti-Saloon League is opposed to the drug investigation as recommended by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN?

Mr. KAHN. I did not know that.

Mr. MEEKER. They are doing so in their papers, and have received contributions from organizations for that purpose.

Mr. KAHN. I know that the Treasury Department, in its desire to go to the bottom of this question, namely, the enforcement of the Harrison narcotic-drug act, appointed a committee of which Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, a Member of this House, is chairman. Prof. Reed, of Harvard, is a member, and Dr. Dumes, Col. Bailey, of the United States Army, and B. C. Keith, of the Treasury Department, are the other members. These gentlemen have been investigating this important question. It is a question that the Members of this House are called upon now to take into consideration in deliberating on the pending bill.

The question before us is, Do we want to prohibit the use of light wines or beer, with their limited alcohol contents, or drive these men who need stimulants and who, by hook or crook, will get the stimulant, to the use of these deadly narcotic drugs? That is one of the questions before this committee to-day.

Beer has only 4 per cent of alcohol, and the brewers of this country have recently reduced that small percentage to an almost negligible quantity of spirits. Under this bill it will be impossible for a man to secure a glass of beer or a glass of light wine, not only during the continuance of this war, but for the period of demobilization after, and God alone knows how long that period is going to be.

Mr. Chairman, the proponents of this measure appeal to the Members of this House on a false issue. They tell us that they intend to conserve the food of this country during the war. My State of California makes practically 90 per cent of the wine made in the United States. There is not a particle of food product that goes into the making of these light wines. But certain varieties of grapes that can be used for food are crushed for medicinal wines, and they are specially excluded from the provisions of this act.

The light wine that is used in everyday life is made from the wine grape. You have to make wine out of those grapes or throw them into the waste barrel. You can not make anything else out of them. You can not make raisins out of them. You can not make preserves out of them. The only thing you can make of the wine grape is wine.

The wine grape has been a gradual development in my State. Wine was made in California by the old Franciscan monks, who came there from Mexico in 1769. They brought the grape cuttings, which had been procured originally from Spain, and planted them in California. For years we had what they called the Mission wine. Later on, when California came into the Union and our agricultural interests began to develop, it was found that the soil and topography of the country lent themselves admirably to the cultivation of the grape. And so experts went to the grape-growing countries of Europe and brought back recognized varieties of vine cuttings. The Department of Agriculture immediately came to the assistance of the California grape growers and wine makers.

The officers of that department established experiment stations in our wine-growing sections. Those stations told the farmers of that grape-growing area what varieties of grapes thrive best under the conditions that prevail there. The State of California itself organized a board of viticulture. They made experiments, and under their advice and suggestions the industry has grown to such proportions that between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 are invested in the industry. California wine is being used in every civilized country. I want to call to the attention of this committee this notable fact, namely, that in no country in the world where the people are a wine-drinking people are there any considerable number of drunkards. If you allow the use of light wine, if you allow the use of beer, you are not going to have a nation of drunkards. But if you vote for absolute prohibition you are going to establish this country on an alcohol basis and a habit-forming drug basis. Distillation is the easiest of all processes. If a man can not buy good whisky in a reputable establishment, he will procure a little "still" and make it in his own home. That is what you are driving the people of this country to do. Why, the Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK] told me of an instance that occurred in the State prison of the State of Missouri. There was a prisoner at Jefferson City who got hold of a gun barrel which he hid in his cell. He used that as a distilling worm. He took a little water from the daily supply that he received. Then he took some corn bread, that he saved from his ration, and made a mash of it. He thus was enabled to distill whisky right in his cell. He finally grew ambitious and thought he would save up enough alcohol to get a right good drink. In fact, he did save up enough to get a right good drink and got ingloriously drunk. That is how the authorities found out how he had been distilling right under their noses. My colleagues, with that kind of an instance before you, you can readily imagine what will happen in this country if you try by this kind of drastic legislation to deprive a man of a mild stimulant.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman think this same consequence would follow on the prohibition of liquor drinking as readily as beer drinking?

Mr. KAHN. I have just told the gentleman that I think this drastic legislation is going to result in things infinitely worse than the use of beer, light wines, or ardent liquor.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman thinks prohibition of the liquor traffic will bring about a worse condition than to have it?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; in some respects.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman I think spoke and voted against the national submission of that question.

Mr. KAHN. I do not remember whether I spoke against it, but I know I voted against it.

Mr. RUCKER. I have looked up the RECORD and the gentleman spoke against it.

Mr. KAHN. I probably did, because I have pronounced views on the subject.

Mr. RUCKER. And made a strong speech for a worthless cause.

Mr. KAHN. And I am as strong for temperance as the gentleman from Missouri; and I am as temperate as the gentleman from Missouri; and I have never in my life been drunk; and I have never taken a glass of liquor except under a doctor's order or prescription.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I can concede the gentleman is as sober as myself and as temperate as myself and a better man than myself.

Mr. KAHN. No; not a better man by any means.

Mr. RUCKER. And that possibly the gentleman is on the wrong side of the whisky question and always has been. That is my view of it.

Mr. KAHN. That is simply the gentleman's opinion. I want to say to the gentleman that I have heard men, who believe as the gentleman does, say emphatically that whisky is a poison; that it has no value whatever for medicinal purposes.

Mr. RUCKER. I will admit it has not poisoned me, but it is a bad thing to use.

Mr. KAHN. I want to read in that very connection a very interesting bit of correspondence. Some weeks ago, or, I should say, some months ago, I saw in the newspapers that the Navy Department had accepted from the sheriff of Seattle, Wash., 6,500 quart bottles of whisky that had been confiscated by the authorities for violation of the State prohibition law. I became interested in that fact because the dispatches said that they were to be used by the Navy Department for medicinal purposes, and having become interested I wrote to the Surgeon General of the Navy this letter:

JULY 19, 1918.

Surg. Gen. W. C. BRAISTED,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL: I have seen in the press dispatches on several occasions items to the effect that quantities of distilled spirits seized in various so-called "dry" communities were turned over to the Navy Department for medical purposes. I believe the last article of the kind that I saw was purported to come from some point near Seattle, Wash. Can you give me the facts about this matter? I would greatly appreciate your courtesy and kindness.

Very sincerely, yours,

JULIUS KAHN.

Whereupon I received this letter in reply. It is exceedingly illuminating, taking into consideration that the Secretary of the Navy occupies the same position on this question as my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
Washington, D. C., July 31, 1918.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant with regard to certain distilled spirits seized at some point near Seattle, Wash., you are informed that the Secretary of the Navy received a dispatch from the commandant of the thirteenth naval district reporting that the mayor of Seattle had offered to him a quantity of good whisky which has been seized on account of the violation of some law, and that the offer was made to the Medical Department of the Navy rather than the whisky should be destroyed.

In the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, it was deemed wise to accept this whisky and a telegram was sent to the commandant of the thirteenth naval district by this bureau authorizing the acceptance on his part, provided that there should be no objection or unfavorable recommendation on the part of the United States Collector of Internal Revenue.

This is the entire transaction, so far as I have been informed, to this date, and the whisky so received will be used for medical purposes.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. C. BRAISTED,
Surgeon General, United States Navy.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Applause.]

So Secretary Daniels evidently thinks whisky has medicinal virtues. Of course it can be, and sometimes is, used to excess by individuals. Of course it sometimes brings disaster to the individual who uses it in excess.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. No; not now. But the use of whisky in moderation can not be said to be injurious to the individual. Certainly it is not nearly so injurious as the use of narcotics, I repeat, if whisky is used in moderation. I do not myself use it, but I have no objection to a man who does use it if he does so in moderation and as a stimulant. When a man gets along to a certain time of life he almost invariably requires stimulants. Your doctor will probably tell you that. The use, but not the abuse, of liquor will do nobody any harm. Whereas the use of drugs, habit-forming drugs, "dope," will under every circumstance harm the individual. Oh, this legislation which is pending at this moment, in my opinion, is simply the expression of a blind, unreasoning fanaticism.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman and myself neither have been home for a year or more?

Mr. KAHN. For 10 months I have not been home.

Mr. RAKER. On the 17th of this month the gentleman's party met, and mine also. Did not both political parties in California indorse the Federal amendment?

Mr. KAHN. No; at least so I have heard.

Mr. GORDON. Your party did not.

Mr. KAHN. Your party did not. [Applause.] It advocated war-time prohibition, but not the prohibition amendment.

Mr. RAKER. What was the attitude of the gentleman's party?

Mr. KAHN. Well, my party indorsed the prohibition amendment. But I am also the nominee of the Prohibition Party in my district. [Laughter and applause.] The Prohibitionists named——

Mr. BUTLER. What are they—derivatives of the real prohibitionists?

Mr. KAHN. The Prohibitionists in my district know my stand on this question, my unfailing stand, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], and wrote my name on their ballots in sufficient number to give me the nomination of their party. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Now, the remarkable thing about this proposed legislation is this: They propose to cut out the use of beer and wine. They propose to prevent its manufacture after May 1, 1919, and then prohibit their sale after the 30th of June, 1919. And the Committee on Agriculture has recommended, by a committee amendment, that Italy and other foreign wine-producing countries shall be allowed to dump their wine into this country to compete with the manufacturers of native wine, who at best, if this provision carries, will be put to it pretty hard to dispose of their stock by the 1st of next July. France, Spain, and Portugal are about to ask for the same privilege. Is that fair? Is that just? I appeal to the sense of fairness——

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield. I appeal to the sense of fairness of the Members of this House to prevent such a consummation. I appeal to your sense of justice. Either extend the time within which the native product can be disposed of and sold, or do not permit the product of foreign countries to come here and destroy the home markets of the native producer.

The wine makers of California recognize the fact that national prohibition is very likely to become a part of the fundamental law of this country. They are trying to liquidate their business. They are trying to do so in good faith. Do not deprive them, I beg of you, of a fair opportunity to do so.

I shall offer an amendment when the bill is up under the five-minute rule, to extend the time for the sale of wines in this country to December 31, 1919. And I hope that the membership of this House, looking upon the proposition fairly and justly, will adopt that amendment, so that the grape growers and wine makers of California, who for years have been developing a great industry, shall be permitted to go out of that business in a clean, honorable, lawful way.

I want to say one further thing about the "dope," or habit-forming drug business. I have here several small bottles of "dope" that is being sold now in ever-increasing quantities, and which is not reached by this or any other legislation. A lot of it is manufactured right over in Baltimore. There is one concern over there by the firm name of McCormick & Co., that in 1915 sold 2,585 gallons of Bateman's Drops, paregoric, and Godfrey's Cordial. In 1917, two years later, when prohibition had gone into effect in the District of Columbia, they sold of those same remedies 4,803 gallons.

Bateman's Drops, according to the formula printed on the label, has 42 per cent of alcohol and 1.9 grains of opium. So that you not only get your strong alcohol, but almost 2 grains of opium with it. I repeat the sale of that is not prohibited, and you can buy it in any drug store and at a great many grocery stores.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, although I do not insist on it. It is a question that has been bothering me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman get a little time in which to answer the question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes' time to the gentleman in which to answer the questions.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman, and will try to answer these questions.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not possible to prevent the manufacture and sale of this stuff you have in your hand? Is there any law that will do it, or can not a law be enacted?

Mr. KAHN. There is no law at the present time.

Mr. BUTLER. Can we not enact one?

Mr. KAHN. I suppose we can. But I fear that when we have enacted it they will evade that law and still continue to feed the people such stuff as is contained in these bottles.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman said that it contained 1.9 grains of opium.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Per fluid ounce.

Mr. KAHN. Now, Lemon Compound, which they sell a great deal of, has 15 per cent of alcohol. That is 3 per cent more alcohol than is found in light wines. Paregoric, which they feed even to babies, has 47 per cent of alcohol and 1.83 grains of opium.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to say that those matters were considered by the Ways and Means Committee in framing the revenue bill, and particularly that part of it which amends the Harrison narcotic law, and I recall receiving a letter from a large firm in which they criticized me very vigorously for attempting to limit the sale of these pure household remedies.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman has made a careful study of the statistics in reference to those pure household drugs. What is the per cent of people who have cultivated the habit of using those household articles compared with the per cent that use whisky to excess?

Mr. KAHN. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I know this committee to which I referred as having been appointed by the Treasury Department is made up of very reputable gentlemen, including one distinguished Member of this House, Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY of Illinois. They have found out that of those cases that could be authenticated, 1,500,000 "dope users" are now extant in this country.

Mr. RUCKER. They did not say how many of those use liquor to excess?

Mr. KAHN. No; they did not get that information.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Just a short one.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman any statistics as to how many people in the hundred millions in this country dig graves through gluttony?

Mr. KAHN. I told the House at the beginning of these remarks that the doctors say 600,000 a year do so.

Now, I want to call your attention to several other matters. The statement that drunkenness is so common in this country is not borne out by the facts. We had 19,000,000 admissions to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco in 1915, and there were only 83 arrests during the whole period of the exposition for drunkenness. Wine, beer, and whisky were not prohibited on the exposition grounds nor in the city of San Francisco. Only 83 arrests. Just think of it. That speaks volumes for the sobriety of the American people. So, when you undertake to write legislation of this kind upon the statute books of the Republic, you practically indict this whole Nation as a nation of drunkards, and I object to that emphatically.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. There are several of us who differ from your views but are in doubt about this proposition which you took up last in your speech. I wish you would illuminate it a little further. We are in doubt as to whether we should vote to concur with the Senate amendment or whether we should vote to concur with an amendment to it which would permit Italy, I think it is, to import wines. Now, then, could you tell us—and I am asking for information only, not to refute anything you said, because we are all going to vote the way we please in the matter in a minute or two—but I would like to know if there is any treaty obligation involved there with Italy that should induce us to extend the time for her to import wine?

Mr. KAHN. I have understood Italy has contended that there is, and I think France, Spain, and Portugal have since then sent a communication to the State Department claiming that they, too, have rights similar to those of Italy. That is why I say if you adopt the amendment so as to allow them to ship their wines into this country until the first of May, 1919, in all fairness—because those wines will compete with the native wines—you ought to extend the period for the sale of wines in this country until December 31.

Mr. DECKER. Would it not be a safer or surer policy on the part of the gentleman from California, if he wanted to protect his industry out there, in case there is any treaty obligation, if you would just join the rest of us and concur in the Senate amendment? That will give your people a better chance to sell their wine than they would have if you would concur with an amendment, would it not?

Mr. KAHN. I will say this to the gentleman: One of the indictments that we constantly make against the Imperial Government of Germany is that it disregards its treaty obligations; and I for one do not think it wise on the part of this country to disregard any of its treaty obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have another minute. I would like him to answer a question.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes of the time which has been allotted to me.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. DECKER. I really wanted to know the view of the gentleman from California as to these treaty obligations, because I have much confidence in his ability, and I speak sincerely. There are none of us in this House, even prohibitionists, who would treat a treaty as a scrap of paper, and if there is a treaty between Italy and the United States, that settles it. That binds us, and we want to be fair with your people.

Mr. KAHN. The Secretary of State, I am advised, has informed the Committee on Agriculture of this House that there is a treaty with Italy. I am not fully informed myself. All that I know about it is what I have seen in the newspapers. That is as far as I know. We also saw in the newspapers the statement that when the committee seemed to take favorable action on the Italian request, France, Spain, and Portugal came in and said they had similar treaties and were entitled to similar privileges.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This opens the door to all wines from every country?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; because of the "favored-nation" clause. It undoubtedly would open the door for the entry of wines from every country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would apply to any country?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly so. I want again to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for extending my time for five minutes. In that time I want to recall to the attention of this House the fact that the Apostle Paul in his First Epistle to Timothy, chapter 5, verse 23, advised the latter, "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Let me also recall to you the fact that Jesus performed His first miracle by turning water into wine. Let me read from the Gospel of St. John, chapter 2:

And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there:
2. And both Jesus was called, and His disciples, to the marriage.
3. And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto Him, They have no wine.
4. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come.
5. His mother saith unto the servants, Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it.
6. And there were set there six waterpots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece.
7. Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with water. And they filled them up to the brim.
8. And He saith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it.
9. When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants which drew the water knew), the governor of the feast called the bridegroom,
10. And saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now.
11. This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory; and His disciples believed on Him.

Does any man think that He who is worshiped by hundreds of millions of people all over the world would have done a thing that would have worked ill upon the people with whom He and His disciples were present at the marriage festival?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I would like to know——

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield now. I only have a minute more time. There are thousands, yes, there are millions, of men in the world, whether they believe in His divinity or not, who realize that in His life He exemplified the greatest perfection of mankind. They know that His teachings were pure, and that any man, be he Christian or Jew, Pagan or Mohammedan, will become an infinitely better human being in the sight of God and man if he follows the precepts of that Great Teacher. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time for the purpose of putting in the RECORD the fact that I favor this bill and the prohibitory clause in it.

I had several conferences with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and in those conferences he told me he thought the vote on this bill would be reached Saturday. In the light of that information I made an engagement to speak in Chicago to-day. When it became apparent that the vote could not be reached Saturday, but that it would be reached to-day, I changed the date of that meeting until to-morrow.

To make that engagement I have to leave Washington at 6 o'clock this evening. I would not go if my vote was required to pass the measure. It is very apparent that the measure will be passed by an overwhelming majority. I did not want to leave without putting into the RECORD the fact that I favor the bill, and I favor the prohibitory clause.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have voted to exclude saloons from the Capitol Building. I have voted to eliminate saloons in this Capital City. I have voted to exclude saloons from the military reservations, and I propose to-day to vote for this amendment which ends, during the period of this war at least, the sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States. [Applause.]

I have seen whole communities, blasted for years by saloons, emerge into prosperity when saloons were banished from within their boundaries. I expect to see prosperity still prevail in all sections of these United States when the saloons disappear, prosperity even greater than we have enjoyed in the past.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, in obtaining revenue for this Government I have voted always for the highest possible tax upon alcoholic liquors. I have supported to the best of my ability at all times the movement for the increase of the taxes on alcoholic liquors of all kinds. But as a member of that committee, engaged for six years and even for a longer period than that, in solving these questions of revenue I think I am able to say that we can run this great Government without saloons, and, by the eternal gods, we will find the revenue somewhere with which to carry on this Republic without continuing further this alliance with saloons. [Applause.]

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has correctly stated, as he always does in matters he investigates himself, the result of the investigation conducted by the Treasury committee, of which I am chairman, in the matter of the increase in the number of dope fiends in the United States. That committee has reached the conclusion that there are now at least 1,500,000 addicts in this country. But the greater number of them, and the greater increase in the number of addicts, has occurred in the cities in this land where there are saloons almost in every block. The number of addicts has increased right alongside of the saloons. They have gone right along with the saloons.

The gentleman has called attention to such alleged remedies as Bateman's Drops, which sometimes contain as much as 47 per cent of pure alcohol in volume, and to paregoric, which contains more alcohol than wine contains, and to Godfrey's Cordial, a 15-cent bottle of which contains a good drink of whisky, and, in addition, contains derivatives of opium.

These alleged remedies are manufactured under the permission of section 6 of the Harrison Antinarcotic Act. In all these dry territories, territories which have become dry recently, the increase in the consumption of Bateman's Drops, which is merely whisky mixed with opium and similar preparations, has been alarming. The Treasury committee of which I am the chairman has recommended the repeal of section 6 of the Harrison narcotic law. I presented to the Ways and Means Committee sections modifying the Harrison antinarcotic law, which I prepared myself, and the Ways and Means Committee accepted these sections and made them a part of the revenue bill which has passed this House. The revenue bill which has passed this House contains a clause eliminating section 6 of the Harrison Narcotic Drug Act.

[The time of Mr. RAINEY having expired, by unanimous consent he was given three minutes more.]

This House, preparing for its vote to-day for prohibition for the period of this war, by an overwhelming majority adopted without dissent the paragraph in the revenue bill which eliminates section 6 of the Harrison Narcotic Act, under which these remedies to which the gentleman from California has called attention have been manufactured and sold in all the States in this land.

Our action to-day is perfectly consistent. We can not vote for prohibition in either House and at the same time permit, under the Harrison Act, a drink of whisky to be sold in these little Bateman's Drops bottles and these other bottles at every grocery store and every drug store in the United States provided they contain a little less than 2 grains of opium; and so, before the action of to-day, we have eliminated, so far as this House is concerned, section 6 of the Harrison Narcotic Act.

I want to say in reference to the Anti-Saloon League that I took this matter up with its officers, Dr. Dinwiddie, and the others several months ago. Their employees have copied hundreds of pages of manuscript in recent days in my office, preparing to assist in the fight throughout the United States for the complete elimination of the sale of narcotics, except for medicinal purposes, everywhere in this land. They heartily approve of the efforts of the Treasury committee to abolish from the laws section 6 of the Harrison Narcotic Act, and are cooperating in every possible way in order to bring about that result.

I have here a letter from a manufacturer of fluid extracts in Baltimore. They manufactured from January 1 to August 20 of this year 19,000 gallons of Jamaica ginger, lemon and vanila extracts, and strawberry extracts containing alcohol. These flavoring extracts are sold in dry territory, and the drier the territory the more of these flavoring extracts are sold. They are sold because they contain whisky and are sold to rum addicts throughout the land.

Here is the letter from this firm that manufactures more flavoring extracts than any other firm in this section of the United States, and they announce the alarming fact—alarming to them—that the increase we have made in the tax on alcohol to be used for nonbeverage purposes is resulting, as they find, by consulting manufacturers throughout the country in the fact that the manufacturers propose to make lemon extracts, Jamaica ginger, and strawberry and banana extracts without the use of alcohol, and they call it imitation extract because it is made without the use of alcohol. They give prices; they can not make lemon extract using alcohol for less than $7.36 a gallon.

But you can make it without alcohol for 92 cents a gallon, and they say they referred to that as imitation goods. I will print the letter. They say that imitation goods are at times really stronger than the pure, but do not have the flavor and are more rank and therefore not so pleasing to the taste. The thing that makes the extracts made out of alcohol pleasing to the taste is the alcohol they put in it. They call attention to the fact that manufacturers are going to make lemon extract, on account of the high tax on alcohol to be used for nonbeverage purposes, and to make Jamaica ginger, and the rest of those things, without the use of alcohol. They have found out they can do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Under the permission to extend my remarks I print here the letter I have been discussing, which was attached to a letter addressed to me, which I also print:

BALTIMORE, MD., September 16, 1918.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: Inclosed please find a copy of a letter I have written to Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN, which will explain itself. I feel that it is my duty to call this matter to your attention.

Yours, very sincerely,

W. M. MCCORMICK.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1918.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since writing you a few days ago I have taken up with a number of manufacturers of flavoring extracts the proposed increase in tax on alcohol to $4.40 per proof gallon, and was surprised to find that the majority of them had already made or were making plans to manufacture imitation extracts which require very little alcohol, cutting out pure goods entirely. They feel that the price of flavoring extracts is already so high that this additional tax would force them off the market, especially at this time when sugar is so very scarce and the indications are that the manufacture of soft drinks will be greatly reduced.

It is for the above reason that I take the liberty of calling your attention to this matter again, believing that if the additional tax is assessed it would result in "killing the goose that lays the golden egg."

For comparison, please note that when using alcohol costing $9.20 per gallon, as per bill under consideration, flavoring extracts will cost as follows for alcohol alone:

Extract lemon, pure and true: Alcohol contents, $7.36 per gallon; imitation, $2.30 per gallon.

Extract vanilla, pure and true: Alcohol contents, $5.05 per gallon; imitation, $0.92 per gallon.

An additional loss to the Government would be the import tax on oil of lemon and vanilla beans, both of which are imported, while the imitation goods are made from vanillin, coumarin, and citral, all of which are made in this country and consequently pay no tax.

The average consumer, using the same size package, would pay 10 cents for imitation and 40 cents for pure goods.

Imitation goods are at times really stronger than the pure but do not have the flavor, and are more rank and penetrating, therefore not as pleasing to the taste.

The flavoring-extract industry to-day pays a larger percentage of taxes than any other, whisky, beer, and tobacco included, and this all has to be borne by housewives on farms as well as in the cities. (The bakers use the more concentrated forms of extracts and are not, therefore, so much affected by the present or proposed bill.)

Summing the whole thing up, I am convinced that the Government would actually lose money by increasing the tax on alcohol to such a great extent, for the flavoring-extract industry is the largest consumer of pure ethyl alcohol to-day.

Yours, sincerely,

W. M. MCCORMICK.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, since I have had the misfortune to represent the ninth district of Ohio I have always voted on economic questions with the majority of my district. We have had three elections in Ohio on the prohibition question to amend our constitution. It has been three times voted down in my district. For these three elections the majority has been on an average about 7,000. I believe I am as good, if not a better, temperance man than the gentleman who just preceded me. I do not have occasion to use spirituous liquor in any form. I never had a cigar or a cigarette in my mouth; I do not even chew gum. [Laughter and applause.] On the Atlanta campaign of 110 days—under fire every day—I was told by my chaplain, a very reliable gentleman, and the surgeon general of our division, that I was the only officer in that division who never took a drink of whisky during the whole 110 days. You can not make men good by law; you can make men bad by law, and you can make men hypocrites by law.

I will vote for any and all bills to promote morality and temperance, but this prohibition amendment is conceded by the leading lawyers on this floor to be unconstitutional, and the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill concedes it to be unconstitutional, I am reliably informed.

Every Member when he enters this Chamber at the commencement of every Congress takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. I regard that oath as sacred, and under no circumstances or conditions will I knowingly violate it.

I desire in connection with my remarks to send to the Clerk's desk a letter which I received from 16 prominent business men of the city of Toledo, representing perhaps a majority of the bankers and business men of Toledo. Our 15,000 organized laborers, representing the intelligence and patriotism of the laboring classes, have passed resolutions practically unanimously against this prohibition legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the matter referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TOLEDO, OHIO, August 27, 1918.

Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: At a special meeting of the Toledo Hotel Men's Association held at the Boody House on August 26 the membership was unanimous in directing that a communication be dispatched to you vigorously protesting against the passage of the pending prohibition amendment to the emergency Agricultural appropriation bill, for the reason that its adoption will cause irreparable and immeasurable loss to the individuals and concerns whose fortunes are invested in the hotel business in this city, as well as deprive the local, State, and National Governments of revenues seriously needed.

The proposed measure is purely a subterfuge. On his recent return from England Herbert Hoover declared that the allied countries are well supplied with food materials except sugar, due to the patriotic zeal of the American people, who have so cheerfully aided his administration in rendering food conservation a success. No class of business men have rendered more aid in that behalf than the hotel proprietors of the Nation and those of Ohio in particular.

If prohibition would win the war, or even help win it, the allies would have adopted it long ago. On the contrary, all, including Russia, have rejected the fake nostrum after an experimental trial.

The Toledo Hotel Men's Association represents vested capital aggregating $5,000,000. Prohibition in any form will very seriously impair, if not wholly destroy, that enormous collective investment. The men and concerns interested are large purchasers of liberty bonds and thrift stamps and have given liberally of their means to all causes of war charity. Wholly aside from that, they pay large personal taxes, income taxes, and revenues, employ large numbers of people wholly dependent on their earnings, who would otherwise not be able to meet the demands of war conditions, and are in addition lending all possible aid locally and otherwise to further the great cause of world democracy.

While willing and ready to make any sacrifice necessary to help win the war, we protest vigorously against ruination of our business by fake reformers, who have embraced the present state of war as an excuse and not a reason for clubbing the Nation into submitting to prohibition, with its consequent unrest and turmoil, at a time when strict cooperation and unification are so highly necessary to render the victory over Prussianism complete.

A full membership of this association joins in this protest, and it should be borne in mind that there are a number of hotels in Toledo that do not have bars in connection, so this protest is not altogether a selfish one. The following constitute the membership, together with the hotel properties represented by each:

A. L. Wallick, president and manager Secor Hotel.
E. P. Severcool and E. B. Edmonds, owners and managers Waldorf Hotel.
Sherman Bond, president and manager Boody House.
L. Aljoe, managing director Navarre Hotel.
A. C. Stephens, president and manager St. Clair Hotel.
Charles Ehle, manager Jefferson Hotel.
Edmonds & Stair, owners and managers Toledo Hotel.
Fred Crossett, proprietor and manager Madison Hotel.
William Deffenbache, proprietor and manager Monticello Hotel.
William F. Widell, president and manager Widell Hotel.
Entemann Bros., owners and managers Park Hotel.
Chris. E. Meyers, owner and manager Wade Hotel.
F. F. Tompkins, owner and manager Hotel Tompkins.
John C. Weaver, owner and manager Weaver's Tavern Hotel.
M. J. McCormick, owner and manager Grand Hotel.
Mrs. M. M. Swaab, manager Court Hotel.

Very truly, yours,

TOLEDO HOTEL MEN'S ASSOCIATION,
By A. C. STEPHENS, President.

Attest:

E. W. HARMEYER, Secretary.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] has gone from the room, for I have here a rather interesting document in regard to the attitude of this high and holy organization known as the Anti-Saloon League on the drug question. Last year it was my privilege to submit to this House, as some of the by-products of prohibition, a list of 747 so-called medicines that run all the way from eight-tenths of 1 per cent to 93½ per cent in alcohol. I discussed at that time the use of opiates and drugs. But the important and interesting thing in this is the national attitude of Pharisaism and hypocrisy that it brings out. I do not know of any measure that comes on the floor of this House where so many men ask to be excused from the roll call as when they vote on this. The only organization in America that wants secret pledges from men in advance of their nomination is the Anti-Saloon League, and no other concern does business that way. This Anti-Saloon League, whose superintendent or attorney, Wheeler, told me in Oberlin, Ohio, in 1894, if I would join the organization they would make a rich man out of me because it was the best graft now going in America; and who in 1909, when I met him in Salt Lake City, Utah, on his return trip from California, laughed at the people of Utah for coming across with funds as they did, the same time they toured that country out there, and he happened to think afterward I had taken the other side of it and did not talk any more. This holy organization that takes over a million dollars from the drug concerns a year, a holy institution that stops at nothing to destroy a man's character or reputation who will not yield to them, and who to-day is carrying on the movement in this country to destroy every man, not only financially but every other way they can, who dares to stand against them, who have told me in my home they would destroy me if I did not yield to them; these men who if they were not in Washington this bill would never have been brought out and we all know it. What is the use of this camouflage parading around here? We know that this bill is here at their order and no other. Let us see how they stand on the drug proposition.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN introduced over in the Senate a resolution for an investigating committee that was just reported, a resolution to investigate the use of drugs in this country by the appointment of a commission. That commission shall investigate the causes which lead to the use of habit-forming drugs, the extent of the use of such drugs, and the kind of drugs used, and shall also investigate the subject of the drug addicts and such other factors as in its judgment have an important bearing upon the use of narcotic and habit-forming drugs, and shall recommend to the President the best methods in its judgment of regulating the importation, the manufacture, sale, and use of narcotics and habit-forming drugs and of solving the problem presented by the drug addicts.

In the American Issue, the editorial organ of the Anti-Saloon League, in which the names of some of the gentlemen referred to by the gentleman from Illinois appear, on page 4, its editorial page, August 31, it has this to say about this resolution. I say these drug concerns have financed the Anti-Saloon League, and there is not a man on the floor of this House who dares to produce their books. And I say you men to-day are getting ready to cast your ballot under the lash of the Anti-Saloon League for the purpose of turning this country over to these drug men who are in the pay of this habit-forming drug organization. I mean just what I say, but at the present time you had just as well bay at the moon. The American people are getting into the drug-use game. They substitute it for alcohol and the advance agent for that organization is the holy Anti-Saloon League of America, which if you took the money from their coffers would close business to-morrow.

The only men who ask you to make secret pledges in writing before you are nominated and say, "We will keep it secret if it will embarrass you in your nomination and election." I do not say all men get such communications. I say the Missouri delegation has had them for the last three elections. I do not say who answered them or how. I say that is the practice of that organization, and it is not alone in Missouri. Men would rather do anything than be put on a roll call on these bills.

Here is an editorial on this very resolution. I will produce a letter from the Anti-Saloon League in that regard and put it in the RECORD if anybody wants to see it. This says:

A ROSEWATER RESOLUTION.

A joint resolution was introduced in the United States Senate July 13 by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN authorizing the President to appoint a commission to investigate the subject of narcotic and habit-forming drugs. The first "whereas" reads as follows:

"Whereas it is openly charged by scientific men and statisticians that the use of narcotic and habit-forming drugs is largely on the increase, not only in the form of opium, morphine, cocaine, heroin, and kindred opiates, but also certain so-called 'soft drinks' charged with caffeine, sold at innumerable fountains to our young men and young women." This is significant, not so much for what it contains as for what it omits.

If Congress is to provide $50,000 for a junketing commission in this time of stress and strain it should be no half-way inquiry, but should cover all kinds of habit-forming drugs. The significant omission in the resolution is alcohol. Why? Surely, if the trace of caffeine in some so-called "soft" drinks is a sufficient menace to the health and morals of the people to justify a congressional investigation, the menace of alcohol is a thousandfold greater. While investigating caffeine why omit coffee, which, as ordinarily served, contains more of the drug than any ordinary "soft" drinks served at soda fountains? Then Congress must not overlook the alkaloid theine, contained in every infusion of tea leaves, which is chemically identical with caffeine. The committee might cause offense to another alkaloid, nicotine, a product of the tobacco plant, if the investigators overlooked its claims as a narcotic and habit-forming drug.

We are very much afraid that the brewers are trying to "put one over" on Senator FRELINGHUYSEN by getting him to introduce this Rosewater resolution.

In 1908 "Rosewater," then known as Rosenwasser—

A man who was recognized as being of exceptional intellectual capacity and held that place, but his report was adverse to the Anti-Saloon League. That is the way they treat him, the man who had opened the first dope clinic in the world, and they appeal to the fact that his name was once "Rosenwasser," but a man who so hated all suggestions of Germanism that years ago he changed his name to Rosewater. And yet they try to bring that up, Mr. Chairman, as an argument—was a member of a commission on dependency and crime in the State of New Jersey, the president of which was Michael T. Barrett, vice president of the Lyon & Sons Brewing Co. and secretary of the United States Brewing Co., both of which companies have been taken over by A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian. This commission prepared a whitewashing report, so far as alcohol is concerned, and recommended the sale of liquor on Sundays.

Congress has already legislated in the Harrison Act very strongly on the question of narcotic drugs, and the Department of Justice has complete records on the subject.

Mr. Rosewater is now a commissioned surgeon in the Army, made such since this editorial was written. Pro-German? The only man in America who has conducted his clinic solely on this and has produced in Newark, N. J., an absolute cure of more than 38 per cent of men and women who have come to him as victims of drugs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended. I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now. This commission prepared a whitewashing report, so far as alcohol is concerned. I presume the Surgeon General of the Navy was whitewashed when Mr. Daniels accepted 6,500 quarts of good whisky for the Navy. The enemy of liquor takes it as a gift if it does not offend the Internal-Revenue Department—6,500 quarts at Seattle as a gift. Who bought the Surgeon General of the Navy, when this man is to be brought in who is now a commissioned officer of the Navy and made so since this editorial was written?

So far, so good. This man, at the invitation of four governors of the South, has investigated their States as to the drug condition.

Rosewater, alias Rosenwasser, has maintained for years an office in the city of Newark as a specialist in treatment of drug addicts. Of late he has been wandering about in dry territory with his notebook making superficial notes.

What right? The man has his clinic in Newark, and that is where he has established his world-wide reputation as an investigator. This holy organization that is fighting to save the babies from paregoric; this holy organization that takes the pay of a concern in Michigan that has 47 per cent alcohol in its product and on the bottle is a direction to the baby's mother as to how to give it to the children; this great organization that does not object to the producing of the Wine of Cardui organization in Tennessee and protests against putting out beer that has 4 per cent of alcohol—these great men, these saints, these uplifters who have stopped every bill that has been offered in this House toward the work of this war until they have dictated their own terms, and not one of whom yet has been known as a worker in war work. There are no liberty-bond campaigners amongst them; no Red Cross work amongst them. They are too busy directing what should be done on the hill, these holy men, these drug opponents and enemies, writing this editorial. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] falls for that kind of stuff, in the face of an editorial not a month old.

Here is what they say in conclusion:

So far so good; but why neglect the dope fiends of Newark, Jersey City, Hoboken, and New York, in all of which cities they are a pest? One naturally wonders why, if prohibition of alcohol leads to increased use of other drugs, Rosewater doesn't remove to some prohibition State where he could find more patients.

It is a significant fact that before the doctor took his resolution to Washington his investigations were referred to in Justice, the official booze organ of New Jersey, and in the Newark Ledger, the personal organ of Chris. Feigenspan, president of the United States Brewers' Association. Who employed Rosewater, alias Rosenwasser? Who drew the joint resolution for him? Who are most concerned to divert public attention from the liquor traffic? Why was alcohol omitted from the duties of the proposed commission? One answer will fit all questions.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN will be sensible and discreet if he forgets this joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman know that if the Anti-Saloon League were wiped out of existence the prohibition fight on the floor of this House and elsewhere would go on just the same?

Mr. MEEKER. I do not know anything of the sort, and the gentleman from Texas does not know it, either.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the truth.

Mr. MEEKER. It is not the truth. The Prohibition Party in this country casts an average of 50,000 votes out of 30,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. But it will not stop until the Nation is as dry as a powder house.

Mr. MEEKER. At that time the gentleman will be in heaven, or some other place, instead of in Congress. As long as men are going to prohibit the manufacture of alcohol we in this country are going in two directions. We have two nations to follow so far as the physiology is concerned. Sweden and Turkey, the one to drugs and the other to pure alcohol. Sweden has attempted absolute prohibition, but with what result? That her people have become just as the people of Seattle, Wash., have, with 6,500 quarts of good whisky on their hips to turn over to the prohibition Secretary of the Navy. I wonder who bought Daniels?

I wonder if this high and holy Anti-Saloon League will write an editorial on Daniels taking on board a big jag for the Navy? Consistent, holy gentlemen! We are driving in two directions. You men will come back to this Congress in five years with the problem of the use of drugs that will stagger every man, something that will be destroying our young people, and you will come back with the problem of private distillation that will make that of Sweden look like only the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not intend to say anything upon this proposition, but I was afraid, perhaps, that the vigorous speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] might give you the wrong impression about the views entertained in our State.

The truth of the matter is, the Missouri delegation does not agree with Mr. MEEKER. I have not been authorized to speak for them, but I know that they will not object to my saying that, with perhaps three exceptions, the entire Missouri delegation will vote for this war prohibition amendment. [Applause.]

And I wish to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] that the delegation from Missouri, his colleagues, with whom I have the honor to associate, do not have to sign any pledges, secret or public. Everybody knows in our districts where we stand on this proposition. We have told them before we were elected, and they have no doubts as to how the roll will stand when Missourians' names are called.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] has spent much time in talking about the Anti-Saloon League. I do not represent the Anti-Saloon League, but I know a few of them. I do know Dr. Dinwiddie. I once met a man by the name of Baker, from Ohio, president of the league, who invited me to make a speech at Atlantic City, and I made it and paid my own expenses. I have met a man by the name of Richard Pearson Hobson. I understand that he has been associated with the Anti-Saloon League of America, and I am not afraid to testify that he is the kind of man that does honor to any organization in any country of this world. [Applause.] He needs no tribute of mine or from Mr. MEEKER as to his patriotism. He demonstrated his courage in the War with Spain when he sank the Merrimac, and before men attempt to detract from his honor or his patriotism let them go and do likewise.

The gentleman casts some aspersion upon these people who believe in prohibition as not being workers in this war. I resent it on behalf of the people I have the honor to represent. I resent it on behalf of all good Missourians who believe in prohibition, including those in the district which the gentleman represents. There are people in his district who believe in prohibition, though they are greatly in the minority. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] may talk as though he had the courage of a lion, but we all know that the overwhelming majority of the people in his district are against prohibition. He talks as if he had been persecuted. He speaks as if the people of his district had tried to beat him because he is wet. Let him stand as I have stood and as other members of the Missouri delegation have stood in districts where the people were divided on this question, and then he might talk about persecution. If he had the brewers of St. Louis fighting him because he stood against beer [applause], if he had the distillers against him, then he could come up here and swell out his chest and pretend to be a courageous lion, standing for what he believed. [Applause.] He has spoken much against the Anti-Saloon League, against Dr. Baker, against Dr. Dinwiddie, against Richard Pearson Hobson, against men like William J. Bryan as professional prohibitionists. I want to say something to the gentleman, and he knows I am his friend personally: There are people who are professional antiprohibitionists. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to know, you being one of the Missouri delegation that Mr. MEEKER referred to, whether or not it is the fact that the Anti-Saloon League has been getting secret pledges from members of the Missouri delegation pledging them to vote for prohibition?

Mr. DECKER. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for asking that question. There may have been such pledges sent to some people. I have never received one. I began to make speeches in favor of prohibition long before I started to run for Congress. I am a leader for prohibition out in my country. [Applause.] I do not ask anybody from St. Louis or even Mr. Bryan or Mr. Hobson on that question. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. That is not quite responsive to my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DECKER. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DECKER. I can not speak for other men, but I do not think it is true. It is true that the Anti-Saloon League in Missouri——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Do you mean to say they have not sent out those letters?

Mr. DECKER. Do not attempt to intimate that you are coming up here to intimidate me. Do not think that I am afraid of you.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. DECKER. No; I will maintain order here, so far as that is concerned. They have never been sent to me. Where the gentleman has misled the House is in saying "they promised to keep them secret."

Mr. MEEKER. I will put that copy in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen to observe the rule.

Mr MEEKER. I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I will put a copy of that letter in the RECORD.

Mr. DECKER. All right, put it in the RECORD.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. I am a member of the Missouri delegation, and I never received a letter of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair with the gentleman. I do not think the Anti-Saloon League of Missouri has been in the habit of publishing these pledges. You know the Bible says, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves," and the trouble with a good many prohibitionists in the past has been they have been harmless as doves but have not had as much sense as serpents. The Anti-Saloon League has been fighting the cause with good judgment and has been of great service, and I know of no dishonorable methods that they have been guilty of. Sometimes they may have kept pledges secret. Have the brewers of St. Louis and the distillers always told the people of the country who they were relying upon? [Applause.]

I lived in Kansas when I was a boy and you need not talk to me about prohibition driving people to drugs. You never saw a man that was raised in the State of Kansas that could be elected road overseer in the county where he lived that would dare to stand up and talk against prohibition, national or local. I know you had one man by the name of Hadley that came over from Kansas and was elected governor of Missouri; he was not a prohibitionist publicly, but down in his heart I believe he knew it was a success. A man ran for governor in Kansas three or four elections ago, and he ran on a resubmission platform and did not get enough votes hardly to count. It has been tried in different sections of Missouri. It has been a success. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] can argue with his ability and philosophical trend of mind that wine is a good thing, beer is a good thing, and whisky is better than many things, but I want to say to you men that you do not have to consult a doctor, you do not have to hunt up statistics—the ordinary man only has to go and drag out the skeleton in the closet of his own family to know what whisky does for mankind. [Applause.]

It weakens the strong; it tears down the mighty; it has not been good for statesmen; it has not been good for some preachers and ministers of the gospel. [Applause.] It has not been a good thing for the man who toils with his hands; it has not been a good thing to steady the nerve of the engineer who holds the throttle while you and I are asleep on the cushions. [Applause.]

Do not talk about this being a "holier than thou" movement. I do not claim to be any better than you; I do not claim I will get to heaven quicker than you do; I do not claim that a man has to be a prohibitionist to go to heaven. I do not claim that. It is not a religious question. As long as it was made a religious question such fellows as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] could come into our districts and beat us two to one. When we got to talking to the farmers, the railroad men, the miners, to the boys and the men who do the work, and telling them that it was an economic question; that it meant a question of boots and shoes and clothing for little children, enabling them to go to school, with a fire in the stove to keep them warm, they knew we were telling the truth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DECKER. I hope I am not imposing on your patience, but you must excuse me. This charge of hypocrisy and talk about "holier than thou" has riled me. My good friend Mr. SABATH differs, I see. He is one of the most patriotic men, one of the best men that I have known in Congress. God forbid that I should give the impression, because we differ on this question, that I think I am "holier than thou." Deliver me from ever being a hypocrite. This is not the only question that men like you and me have to settle in Congress. I will not say that this is the most important question.

The most important question is winning the war. Our boys are fighting for the Stars and Stripes over there. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] if this prohibition is a good thing for our soldier boys while being trained to fight and die, why is this prohibition such an evil for the other people of our country who are helping to win the war? [Applause.]

If this prohibition is a good thing for the boys whom we train to lead the charge, why blame the mothers of these boys and the fathers, too, who insist that prohibition is also good for the men and boys who stay at home. These same fathers and mothers are told that we need more grain, more labor, more fuel, more transportation. Why blame them because they demand that you and I as their representatives see to it that food and fuel and labor and transportation are not used in this business which all must admit is not essential to the winning of the war?

Men who are against this proposition in time of peace are for it now. For the sake of conservation, for the sake of increasing our morale, for the sake of the flag, for the sake of victory, the overwhelming majority of America is for prohibition during the war.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DEWALT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purpose.

FOOD-PRODUCTION ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who preceded me talked as if this was a measure to authorize the President to prohibit the use of grain and foodstuffs in the manufacture of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors. Why, we passed a bill of that sort a year and a half ago. As I recall, the food-conservation bill originally passed prohibited absolutely the use of grain in the manufacture of spirituous liquor during the period of the war and authorized the President at any time to prohibit the use of food and grain in the manufacture of vinous and malt liquors, so that no legislation is necessary to accomplish the purpose which the gentleman from Missouri was advocating here so eloquently. Now, I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, none of my family have died drunkards, and I can not testify as an expert, as the gentleman who preceded me says everybody here can. I myself do not use intoxicating liquors in any form as a beverage, and never have since I was 14 years old. So I am not a reformed drunkard, either. My principal objection to this measure is that it violates the Constitution of the United States. I know that will be laughed at. We have been notified from high authority in both branches of Congress that we have suspended the Constitution. Just how that was done nobody has taken the time or trouble to explain. Just how all these people who are bellowing around here have released themselves from their oath of office nobody has suggested.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I can not yield, my time is so limited, but I will yield for a question only.

Mr. SLOAN. Be a little more concrete, if the gentleman pleases, as to who the high authority is that waives the Constitution.

Mr. GORDON. The distinguished Republican leader in the United States Senate so testified in his speech there about a week ago that it was suspended. I inquired of the gentleman in charge of this bill a little while ago how much whisky or spirituous liquors there are in bond under contract with the Government of the United States, the sale of which would be prohibited after the 30th of next June if this bill becomes a law. He said he did not know. He said it was not important anyway, because this bill did not apply to those liquors, which clearly indicates he has not even read the bill of which he is in charge. I will read so much of the bill as contains that provision:

It shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export.

Except for export. Now, not being able to get any information from the committee having charge of the bill I called up the Commissioner of Internal Revenue just now and was informed by him there is in bond deposited under contract with the Government of the United States between 145,000,000 and 150,000,000 gallons of spirituous liquors. The gentleman with whom I talked is the expert in charge of this particular branch of the Internal-Revenue Office, and he said to me that without the tax those liquors are worth $1.50 to $2.50 a gallon, depending upon the time they had been in bond. If this bill passes that 145,000,000 to 150,000,000 gallons which has not been disposed of by the 30th of next June will be confiscated. That liquor was deposited there under contract with the Government of the United States, which permits the owners to withdraw that liquor from bond at any time within eight years by the payment of the legal tax upon it. This bill repudiates that contract. I asked the gentleman how much of this liquor could be sold or disposed of per month, and he said in reply to that that if the tax was not raised they could probably dispose of 5,000,000 gallons per month, but if the $8-a-gallon act, which this House has enacted, should become effective there would not be any of it disposed of, and that it will result in the confiscation of this property worth between two and three hundred millions of dollars. Now, we all like to hear these flowery speeches of our friend from Missouri and other gentlemen who are so hard up for a campaign issue that they seem willing to prove their patriotism by violating their oath of office, and I want to say to you that the Government of the United States under legislation enacted 40 or 50 years ago and amended from time to time since has received this property into its custody. It is now proposing to enact legislation that will confiscate that property. That I say violates the fifth amendment of the Constitution. If it is necessary to get liquor away out of the country to get it away from these people who live in this dry territory, and who consume so much of these drugs and other stuff the gentleman from California told us about, I say if the public welfare requires that this property be destroyed in order to keep it away from them, then I say that the Government of the United States ought to pay for this property before it destroys it. That is what I say. It is a plain, simple proposition. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that private property shall not be taken for public purposes without due processes of law, and due process of law is to pay for the property its true value in money, and nobody proposes to do that. Why, the chairman of this Agricultural Committee, the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, told me that this bill was unconstitutional, but he will vote for it just like all of these other fellows from these dry States.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman know that both France and Switzerland paid——

Mr. GORDON. Every civilized country on the face of the earth has always compensated for the value of property when they saw fit to take property and destroy it. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from California he asked virtually the same thing that I was going to ask.

Mr. GORDON. So far as winning this war is concerned, there is not a single nation on the face of the earth that has adopted prohibition except Russia, and we know what it did to Russia. The manufacture of intoxicating liquors was a Government monopoly before the Czar established prohibition, and it cost him his crown and scepter. I do not see how it helped Russia very much as a military asset. It seems to me that if it proves anything, so far as prohibition in Russia is concerned, it proves that it converts people into pacifists instead of making them fight. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand I am talking to a packed jury here. [Laughter.] I was very much interested in the secret pledges that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] stated had been sent to all the Missouri Members for the last three campaigns.

Mr. MEEKER. If the gentleman will yield, I have already wired for that letter and it will be here.

Mr. GORDON. That makes plain some of these votes that we have been having here. I will undertake to say no man has any right on a public question secretly to pledge himself in advance of his election, and when he does that he has obtained votes by false pretenses.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the corrupt-practises act forbid it?

Mr. GORDON. Yes. The law forbids it.

Mr. RUBEY. I would like to guarantee to the gentleman that, outside of two or three of the Missouri delegation, none of them has received letters of the sort, and we are not pledging ourselves or making secret pledges to anybody.

Mr. GORDON. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. That certainly exonerates him and confirms the high opinion I have always entertained of him.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] indorse that system of trying to obtain votes?

Mr. RUBEY. Certainly not. I do not think the system prevails.

Mr. MEEKER. The letter will be produced.

Mr. GORDON. I was never asked to pledge myself on the question, and, so far as this prohibition question is concerned, my position, I think, has always been well known.

Mr. BLANTON. You spoke of the Government paying for the property.

Mr. GORDON. I spoke of paying for this property before they destroyed it.

Mr. BLANTON. Paying for it if they destroyed it?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Government did agree to pay for it, would the gentleman be in favor of prohibition?

Mr. GORDON. No; I would not. What has that to do with it? I say to you, whether you are in favor of prohibition or not, you ought not to be in favor of this. The property is in the custody of the Government. I do not care how much you are in favor of prohibition, you ought to vote against this bill, because it does not contain any provision to pay for this property which is sought to be destroyed by this legislation. There is not an intelligent man on the floor of this House who does not know that this legislation is unconstitutional, but yet they will stand here and vote for it because they are afraid somebody will vote against them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has expired.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asked unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if no one else would like any time, I would like about five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak of another amendment. When this bill was before the House an amendment was offered forbidding the use of any of the money to pay salaries or expenses of men who should be employed and to whom deferred classification under the draft law was given on account of such employment. That amendment was adopted by practically a unanimous vote of the Committee of the Whole and was later approved by the House. At about the same time other bills of importance providing for the employment of a large number of men were considered and passed. Nearly every one of those bills contained a similar provision. I have in mind the bill providing for the taking of the next census, a bill which provides for the employment of some 80,000 men and women, and without a dissenting voice the Committee of the Whole adopted an amendment forbidding the granting of deferred classification to any man on account of his employment under that law. So the House is committed on that question, and I believe very properly so.

This bill passed and went to the Senate carrying that provision. When it reached the Senate it was amended. It comes back with that provision stricken out. I wish to call the attention of Members of the House to that fact and to prepare them for an amendment that will be offered to disagree to the Senate amendment and instructing the conferees not to yield on that proposition.

Now, under the bill similar to this, passed a year ago, carrying an amount of money much smaller than this bill carries, the Department of Agriculture employed some 4,500, mostly men. This bill, carrying a much larger amount, will continue the employment of the 4,500 and provide for the employment of about 7,000 more, making about 11,500 to be employed under this bill. Almost all of them are or will be employed temporarily for special work, stimulating agriculture, carrying information to the people, gathering statistics, and other kinds of extension work. It was urged against this amendment when it was considered in the House that it would embarrass the regular work of the Department of Agriculture, interfere with the employment or the pay of its regular employees. That statement was not correct. The regular employees of the department are not employed or provided for by these appropriations. These appropriations provide almost entirely for temporary employment of men and women, so that the department can start out now and employ all the men it wishes or needs to employ under this act; but it is up to the department, it seems to me, and my idea in offering the amendment was approved by the House, that it should employ only those who are outside the draft age.

The Department of Agriculture reported to the Committee on Agriculture that at the request of the Secretary, deferred classification had been given to some 2,200 of its employees, and it struck the House as a very large number.

Now, when we consider the large number of girls and women employed in the Department of Agriculture and the large number of men who have been employed there for many years, and who are above 31 years of age, we must see and admit that 2,200 given deferred classification is an unreasonably large number; that the spirit of the draft law has been lost sight of; that the provision of the law permitting deferred classification at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture has been abused. I believe and insist that this law providing for employment of men, almost all of them temporarily, should be so framed as to make it impossible for the Secretary to request or secure deferred classification of these men.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. As to that 2,200 who have received deferred classification, is that 2,200 out of the 4,500 or out of the 11,500?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is 2,200 out of all the men employed in the Department of Agriculture, including the 4,500 employed under a bill similar to this enacted a year ago.

Mr. WALDOW. Does the gentleman say that at the present time there are 11,500 employees of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Oh, there are more than that. There are more than 20,000. I said that under this bill provision is made for the employment of about 11,500 men and women. Forty-five hundred were employed in similar work a year ago and paid out of appropriations carried in a bill similar to this bill, but which carried a smaller amount of money. This bill, carrying a much larger amount than the bill of last year, will continue the 4,500 on the rolls and permit the adding of 7,000 more, making 11,500, or such a matter, employed and to be employed under this act.

Mr. WALDOW. I do not believe the gentleman has caught my point. This bill has not passed. Has the Department of Agriculture employed 11,500 without the passage of this bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No. They have continued, as I understand it, the 4,500 employees that were employed under a similar act passed a year ago, and they are waiting to employ the additional 7,000 until this act shall have been passed.

Mr. WALDOW. Then my contention is correct, that the 2,200 who have received deferred classification——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Are not included in the 7,000 additional to be employed under this act. That is right.

It must impress everybody that 2,200 is a very large number, and that continuation of the policy pursued by the Secretary of Agriculture ought not to be permitted.

It is urged by the Department of Agriculture that if this amendment is passed it will embarrass them in their work, and I have been urged to withdraw my support from the amendment; have been told the work of the department—and to be done under this act—will be embarrassed if the amendment becomes law. They say they wish to employ young men lately out of college to advise and instruct the farmers. [Laughter.] They say men without college training or who have been a long time out of college are not imbued with the spirit of the department, or are not up to date in their knowledge of present-day scientific agriculture. I insist to you, gentlemen, and I say it as a staunch supporter of the extension work carried on by the Department of Agriculture, that the principal objection to that work is and has been that young men without experience have been employed. They go out fresh from college, with too little experience in farming, and undertake to instruct, advise, and assist the farmers in their work, and they do not succeed.

The greatest objection that has been raised to the extension work of the department grows out of the fact that young and inexperienced men without knowledge of problems confronting farmers have been employed. If this amendment, adopted and made a part of this bill at my suggestion a few weeks ago and which the Senate has disagreed to, is put back into the bill it will be up to the Department of Agriculture to employ only older men, men of experience, men who can go to the farmers with better grace, meet them on a common footing and give better advice and produce better results.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that this amendment was stricken out in the Senate, and that we should pay attention to it when we consider the bill under the five-minute rule. Discussion so far on the bill has been altogether on the prohibition amendment, and I thought that unless the attention of the House were called to the draft amendment, so called, it might be lost sight of. It is very important and I trust the House will determine that it should remain in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Senate amendments to House bill 11945 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12923. An act to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 12923. An act to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

FOOD-PRODUCTION ACT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Senate amendments to House bill 11945.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire of the gentleman from Iowa how much time he intends to consume on that side? And before he answers I want to say that we are all anxious to vote on the bill this afternoon. If gentlemen will use as little time as possible for general debate, we ought to begin to vote in a very few minutes. I only have a request for five minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have an hour left, and I have a number who desire to speak. It is possible that some may yield back some of their time and we may get through quicker than that.

Mr. LEVER. I hope gentlemen will use as little time as possible for the accommodation of certain gentlemen who have reservations for to-night and still want to vote on this prohibition amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say he had requests for five minutes only. I have asked for time, and I understand there are others.

Mr. LEVER. I misunderstood the gentleman from Mississippi. Other gentlemen have requested time who say now they do not want it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I believe that all of us are of the same opinion and want to expedite the passage of the bill as much as possible.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the effort of some men to control the habits and thoughts of other men has been the cause of more trouble and bloodshed than any other one thing history mentions. For centuries that particular form of tyranny manifested itself in the struggle of religious faiths. It provoked wars and sent martyrs to the stake. The spirit that caused some men to perish in war and burned at the stake stout-hearted individuals who chose a cruel death rather than recant their views still lives and controls a few individuals in the American Congress. The majority of the Members of this House who scorn the right of American citizens to regulate their own conduct, who have tossed aside personal liberty as of no value, are not of the hard and cruel type that directed the horrors of the religious wars. These moralists of our day are merely working to save their seats in Congress. If they knew that the majority of their constituents were antiprohibitionists they would vociferously uphold that view of this question and would make the House deaf with their clamorous appeals for the personal liberty of the citizen. If they were uncertain about the views of the voters, no power under heaven could get them off the fence. But being convinced that the prohibition sentiment is sweeping the country, they let loose on us these tear-bringing appeals to the emotions that we have been compelled to endure for so long. I was gratified a few moments ago when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] asked the House to remember that this paragraph about prohibition was not the only thing in the bill and that other features of this proposed law are entitled to consideration. But of course his appeal is in vain. When men are excited in the chase after other people's rights they give no thought to such matters. One of the wisest things ever said by Woodrow Wilson was his reference to this very question. In substance he said that one of the most apparent evils of the agitation for prohibition is that it cuts athwart every other question and makes calm consideration of important issues impossible. Here, to-day, we have an illustration of the wisdom of what the President said. It divides families, separates friends, and causes discord in communities. It has become a religious faith and, as of old, its believers are determined that the infidels shall be converted or exterminated. It makes men forget the political faith of the party to which they profess allegiance. Traditionally and in principle the Democratic Party is opposed to it. Platform after platform of the party of Jefferson has pronounced against it or any other form of sumptuary legislation. How many Members of this House care or know about these declarations?

Is it necessary to either coddle or control the grown-up men and women of the United States? They are neither imbeciles nor weaklings. They are a sober, decent, self-respecting people as a whole and have been from the beginning of our history. Certainly, the statesmen of an earlier period were as wise as any we can show to-day, their laws as wholesome, were as truly pious, as truthful, and, pardon me for saying it, infinitely braver in holding and expressing opinions.

The world is rapidly improving in respect to the evil of overindulgence in alcoholic drink. There is comparatively little drunkenness in our country now, and less and less as time goes on. Soon we will come to the view of drunkenness that obtains in other parts of the world and view it as it is viewed in Spain, France, Italy, and other parts of Europe—as a disgrace. Over there the drunkard who is a nuisance is punished, not the sober man who drinks moderately and behaves himself.

A few minutes ago I was talking to one of my colleagues recently returned from Europe. He tells me that he saw very little drunkenness; that in Scotland he saw only three intoxicated men, one Scotchman and two Americans. I do not doubt that the two Americans were from some prohibition community and had never been taught self-restraint. My friend Mr. GORDON, of Ohio, threw himself into this flood of impassioned oratory to call attention to one feature of this proposed law that is entitled to the gravest consideration. He challenges the constitutionality of a law that undertakes to confiscate or destroy property as this bill proposes to do. It is a bit of highwaymanry that no other country, either as a reform or war measure, has resorted to. It proposes to take property from the citizen by the superior force of the State without compensation. That is downright robbery and disgraceful to the American Union. France paid for the distilling plants and the liquors on hand when she abolished the trade in absinth. Switzerland did the same thing. This proposal is on the same moral plane as the act of the highwayman who takes money from the wayfarer by force of arms. For this Government to take or destroy property without full compensation is disgraceful and dishonest.

The talk about it as a war measure is pure humbuggery. It is precisely the program of the prohibitionists from a period long anterior to the present war, the Spanish War, or the War between the States. It is just an opportune phase of prohibition.

Here we are hard put to find money to carry on the war, and these gentlemen propose to cut off one source of revenue that might yield a billion dollars a year. How are we to make up the deficit? Shall it be by customs taxes that will add to the cost of everything we import? Shall it be by consumption taxes on tea, sugar, coffee, possibly butter and eggs? We must have the revenue if we are to defeat Germany. Let these gentlemen who propose to cut off large sources of income suggest others.

Our fathers did not know that it was disgraceful to make or improper to use moderately any sort of alcoholic drink. A glass of wine or a julep in some sections was an incitement to hospitality, to geniality, and increased the delights of all social occasions. Overindulgence in food or drink was rank, disgusting gluttony and equally tabooed in polite society.

George Washington, who was a figure of some importance in the beginning of our Government, was a distiller, and no less respected because of that fact. He sold the product of his distillery to his neighbors and required payment of the bills when due. I dare say there are Members of this House who would have taken his name off their visiting list—for which Washington would probably have been grateful—but long after they have sunk into the sea of oblivion so properly provided for them he will still be cherished by all true Americans as the greatest of all our products and to the end history will set him down as first in war, first in peace, and first in all the attributes of a real man.

Mr. Chairman, these speeches that appeal to the emotional, that overflow with pathos, have interested and amused me. They remind me of the first prohibition speech I ever heard; they are just as logical, just as unconvincing as the one I heard under a big live-oak tree in west Texas. The orator of that occasion had all the tricks of the present-day speakers on the same subject. He came out strong for the defense of mother and home that nobody was assaulting and everybody ready to defend. He denounced vice and praised virtue, in which all were agreed. He was most pathetic and moved those who wear their hearts on their sleeves to tears. He told, and told exceeding well, a story of how a workingman who had received his weekly wage stopped at the saloon on his way home and surrendered to his appetite for drink. His wife was at her poorly furnished home trying to still the cries of her hungry children. She hovered over the dying embers on the hearth, eating out her heart in anxiety, rocking the cradle with one foot while she wiped the tears out of her eyes with the other!

It was a moving and convincing tale.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying to destroy a tyrant in Europe. Let us be careful not to set up others at home. In trying to save democracy abroad let us not forget that it is more important to save it at home.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my remarks slightly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, whatever gentlemen's views may be on the subject of prohibition it must have become reasonably patent to any man who has taken the pains to keep informed that the time for the discussion of the pros and cons of the question of prohibition is past and that the time has come when the people demand that we act. There may be arguments entitled to some consideration against the legislation as contained in this bill, but, next to the determination of the American people to end this war with victory, next to that, the strongest determination in the American heart and mind to-day is that of establishing the condition of prohibition in this country during the period of the war and that will be very evident when the representatives of the people vote on this Senate amendment when we reach it. The American people are determined that for the period of the war at least grains and fruit shall not be used for the purpose of manufacturing intoxicating liquors; that for the period of the war at least conditions of sobriety shall be established throughout the country.

There was a time when arguments were in order, but that time has passed so far as the majority of the American people are concerned, and they are expecting us to act. Not all the American people are satisfied with the provisions of this bill. Some of them would prefer to have the date when prohibition is to take effect extended; many more would like to have, indeed are very anxious to have, the date of the taking of effect of prohibition legislation more immediate, but apart from these differences of opinion the overwhelming majority of the people are behind legislation of this character and for very good reasons. What George Washington did or thought or what other good men did or thought cuts no figure now. Times have changed, and the thoughts and views of men have changed with them, and many a man who a few years ago would have resented as unwarranted interference with personal liberty any legislation prohibiting the use of liquors is now a most ardent advocate of prohibition legislation. Yes; there will be some property losses, regrettable because loss of property is always regrettable; but the men who are in this business are largely responsible for that, for many of them, in the face of the very evident growing determination of the American people to put an end to the liquor business, have not only continued but have enlarged and extended their business.

Mr. Chairman, so much for that. This very important bill, important in its prohibition amendment, important in the aid it gives to agriculture in many lines, has unfortunately been loaded in another body with a lot of legislation that ought never to have been placed upon a bill of this character. It is important that we should regulate rents in the District of Columbia, but the regulation of rents in the District of Columbia has no place on a bill of this character; and while I do not wish to impugn the motive of any gentleman anywhere, I can not understand why anybody should have placed or should want to have remain in this bill legislation of that character if he is entirely and heartily favorable to the general purposes of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. LEVER. This bill has been amended in the other body with four great, big propositions over which the committees reporting it had no jurisdiction, namely, the rent-profiteering bill, the Indian land-leasing bill, the pure-feed bill, and this prohibition measure, with sundry other amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no justification for it, and it all ought to come off of the bill in conference—every bit of it.

Mr. LEVER. Does it not look very suspicious as to motives?

Mr. MONDELL. As I said, I impugn no man's motive, but if I were compelled to form an opinion on the subject I might be constrained to feel that the motive might not have been the best.

Mr. LEVER. I feel very much the same way.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, gentlemen, I want to call particular attention to an amendment on page 26, which if it were presented in the proper way would seem to start all right with a view of preventing the shipment of improper, deleterious, and adulterated feed products. It has no place on a bill of this kind, for this committee should not in connection with the consideration of this bill have to go into the very large question of adulteration. But there is a very peculiar joker in next to the last line of that first paragraph on page 34. It is proposed to prohibit the shipment of ground or shredded straw or hay. Well, in the western country alfalfa is a very important product, and alfalfa meal is one of the very best dairy foods and dairy products. Alfalfa meal is ground or shredded alfalfa hay. In this amendment alfalfa hay and alfalfa meal, as pure products as there are in the world and probably the best of all foods for dairy purposes, is classed along with peanut hulls, rice hulls, ground corncobs, and other products having little or no feed value. The whole paragraph should go off the bill in conference. In any event, these perfectly pure and healthful foods should never be classed with these questionable articles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] relative to the provision of the bill stricken out by the Senate which was intended to prevent the Agricultural Department from becoming a haven for slackers. The American people are intensely in earnest about this war, and they are intensely in earnest in seeing that the draft law is equitably and honestly administered and that there shall be no place anywhere, particularly under Government control, where slackers may find bomb-proof refuge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, it must seem peculiar, to say the least, to the thinking Members of this body that while we are considering this prohibition amendment, tacked on this bill by the Senate as a pretended war measure, to a bill to stimulate agriculture, we are at the same time depriving people not only of their personal liberty but hundreds of thousands of our citizens of their business and property accumulated after years and years of perseverence and toil. All this is being done, we are told, to help win the war, while we are sending an army over the sea to fight for the liberty and freedom of the people everywhere and to make this world a decent place to live in. I regret very much that it is called a prohibition amendment, as there is something more than prohibition involved in it. It means the destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, the lifetime savings of many of those engaged in the liquor business, without any consideration for reimbursement or provision to pay for the property that is ruined and destroyed.

I am not a prohibitionist and never have been. I believe in temperance and am in favor of such regulations as are needed in conducting the traffic in liquor. I do not take any stock in the arguments that are being made here in favor of prohibition, because, as I have stated, this amendment means a great deal more than to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. If I were a prohibitionist and I wanted to do a little work for the prohibition movement, I believe I would start right in here in Washington, where we have prohibition, to do a little missionary work.

I represent a district in Chicago where there are eight or nine hundred saloons doing business. You can walk all over the district in a little over an hour, and I want to tell you I can see as many drunks around Capitol Hill as I can see in my district any day of the week; and I notice, here as elsewhere, that a lot of the loudest shouters for prohibition are among the biggest booze fighters. Now, that is pretty plain, and there is more truth than poetry in it.

As I have told you, this is more, a great deal more, than merely a question of prohibition, because you propose by this act to ruin thousands of people and destroy their property, the life-time savings of many who have worked hard all their lives to accumulate the same, and you want to wipe it out without any consideration for them whatever, without any attempt to reimburse them for their loss. You are going to ruin thousands and thousands of prosperous people engaged in a business that the United States Government has been a partner in ever since the foundation of the Government, without any compensation to them whatever.

We are told that this is a war measure. Everybody who knows anything about the war and the provisions we have made for war-time prohibition knows that that is a fake argument pure and simple. There is no truth in it whatever; the war argument is simply used to further the prohibition movement, but the indications are that it will not go into force until the war is over.

We are told it will conserve grain and coal; that the grain is needed for food. Why, there is more vacant land in golf grounds, thousands and thousands of acres of the best kind of land, that could be planted and produce more grain, if necessary, than is used in all the breweries in the United States. Conserve the grain here, prevent the manufacture of harmless beer, and ship the grain over to our allies to be manufactured into beer and liquor over there, and distributed even to the soldiers in those countries, while it is not allowed within 5 miles of a camp in this country.

Then, again, we want to save the coal. Is it to save it for the poor people that are suffering for the want of coal in our cities or to sell it at a reasonable price? Why, if there was a movement started in this country, or in this House, to do one-quarter of the work to produce coal from the mines and distribute the same that has been done to further the prohibition movement, do you believe that millions all over the country would be threatened as they are now with freezing this winter? Why, out in my section of the country they have already given notice that there is to be a shortage of coal, and the news dispatches tell us that many are compelled at the present time to burn old papers or anything else they can get to burn to keep warm and save themselves from catching cold; but here all the talk is about prohibition to win the war.

If the mines were worked and the coal distributed as it should be, and there was half the effort on the part of this House to see that coal was produced in sufficient quantity as there is to promote prohibition, do you believe that the people would be threatened as they now are in this country with freezing this winter because they can not get coal? Coal will still be furnished to business concerns and factories that supply goods that are not considered necessary or essential for the successful prosecution of the war, but breweries and saloons will be put out of business and the poor people will be still left to suffer from the cold and freeze; who cares?

If this prohibition movement were an honest movement to help the war, I would not say a word about it. I am in favor of winning the war, but everybody knows that such is not the purpose of this amendment. It is dishonest and hypocritical, and I can not understand what the American people are thinking about to allow a few agitators to put over such a law on them.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. There is no use wasting any time with people like you. Everybody knows where you are.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I am talking to men with whom I can reason. I might talk to you for 24 hours and you would vote for prohibition anyway, because your district demands prohibition of you.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I have only a few minutes. And I want to say that if I was going to do some missionary work for the prohibition cause I would like to start in to work up here on Capitol Hill, but what is the use. This is a proposition which you can not argue or convince anybody as to how they shall vote, because they have their minds made up in advance as to how they are going to vote.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of drunkenness which he has seen on Capitol Hill. I would like to ask him this question: Do you refer by that to the official personnel of Capitol Hill or to the visitors here?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think the House knows very well to whom I refer. [Laughter.] I do not think I need explain it.

The liquor business is not the only business that is going to be injured by this law; States, counties, and cities will be financially injured by its passage. In my city alone millions of dollars will be lost to the city government that now goes to the support of the municipality, to say nothing of the hundreds of millions of dollars that will be lost by the United States Government in revenue, at a time when money is so badly needed for war purposes; nor is any business in the country taxed as heavily as the liquor business. Liquor dealers pay a greater part of their income to the Government than does any other business in the United States.

Look at the movement that is going on for the passage of the constitutional amendment for national prohibition in the States. We are told they have 14 States that have already ratified the amendment. What States have submitted the question to the people for a vote on it? I do not know of any State but one that has honestly submitted that question to the voters of the States for ratification. The prohibition element are resorting to force, to bulldoze, and compel the State legislatures to ratify that amendment without ever submitting it to the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I hope I have done some good to help our cause, anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PLATT rose.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I have not started yet.

Mr. DYER. I do not want to take the gentleman's time.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a few minutes in regard to the National Security League. We have heard a most extraordinary tirade here this afternoon by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who declares that this organization is made up of profiteers and scoundrels of one kind and another, and he also alleges that the National Security League has charged every Member of this House who did not vote in accordance with its ideas on the questions selected as tests with being disloyal. That is pure bunk, and the gentleman knows it. It has not charged anybody with being disloyal. It has simply placed before the people in graphic form the records of Members of Congress on the declaration of war, the Kahn amendment to the draft act, the McLemore resolution, and certain preparedness measures. The gentleman from Wisconsin, if he had it to do over again, would not now vote, I am sure, as he did then on some of these measures. He is thoroughly patriotic; nobody, I am sure, doubts that; but we all make mistakes, and, for my part, I think it better to admit them than to abuse the person who points them out. Very few Members of the Sixty-third Congress, for instance, supported the first preparedness motions made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner; but I do not believe there is a man here who will have the hardihood to deny that Mr. Gardner, who has since then laid down his life for his country, was right. The program of preparedness that he advocated so strenuously and ably in the winter of 1914–15 and later in the Sixty-fourth Congress was modest indeed compared with the enormous expenditures we have since undertaken; but if his program had been adopted then it would have saved this country of ours many millions of dollars and doubtless also many thousands of lives.

Those who voted with him, it seems to me, have a right to feel proud of that fact, but they certainly would not for a minute seek to imply that the great majority who voted otherwise were in any sense disloyal. The National Security League has not included those early roll calls of 1915 in its list of test votes; but as they were the pioneer preparedness votes after the beginning of the war in Europe I am going to insert two of them with my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the National Security League needs no defense from me. It is composed of a large number of patriotic citizens scattered over the country, who pay the munificent sum of $1 a year for membership. With the fund so created the league issues its occasional charts and statements.

Here is a chart headed "Congressional vote on preparedness and war," prepared by the league publicity agent, Mr. E. L. Harvey. It shows how all the Members of the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses voted on eight questions selected as tests. With the chart was issued a statement for newspaper publication analyzing the votes and containing a "roll of honor," which comprises the names of 47 men out of 347, who were Members of both Congresses, who "voted right on all eight measures."

He also gives a list of 7 men who "voted wrong on all eight measures," a list of 22 who "voted wrong on seven of the eight measures," a list of 30 "who voted wrong on six of the measures," and a list of 58 "who voted wrong on five of the measures," and it figures up the percentage of wrong votes by States.

Now, it so happens that my name is on the honor roll, as are the names of most of my Republican colleagues from New York State, but I do not think the tests selected were entirely fair, nor do I think it was quite fair to get out an explanation of the chart containing a roll of honor and the names of men who voted wrong on eight, seven, six, and five of the questions selected without also giving the names of the men who voted right on seven, six, and five of the questions selected.

THE EIGHT TEST VOTES.

The eight measures used by the Security League's committee in the compilation of the chart were stated as follows:

No. 1. McLemore resolution, March 7, 1916. This resolution was to the effect that American citizens should forego their natural, legal, and constitutional rights to travel on the high seas.

No. 2. Kahn amendment to the Hay Army bill, March 23, 1916. This amendment sought to increase the Regular Army to 178,000, or more nearly approaching the recommendations of the General Staff of the Army.

No. 3. Brandegee amendment to the Hay-Chamberlain Army bill, April 18, 1916. This amendment provided for an Army of 250,000 as against 140,000.

No. 4. Section 56, providing for a volunteer reserve army wholly under Federal control, April 18, 1916.

These last two dates are wrong. Both votes were on the conference report, May 8, 1916.

No. 5. Motion to recommit naval appropriation bill, June 2, 1916. This motion was designed to secure an increase in the Navy beyond what was provided in the original bill.

No. 6. Cooper amendment, March 1, 1917. This amendment was designed to prohibit to American ships their legal right to carry arms or ammunition in their cargoes.

No. 7. Declaration of war against Germany, April 5, 1917.

No. 8. Kahn amendment to conscription act, April 23, 1917. This provided for the raising by conscription of the necessary Army to give effect to the declaration of war.

Now, the McLemore resolution, the Cooper amendment to the armed-ship bill, the declaration of war against Germany, and the Kahn amendment to the draft act were vital matters, and while no one should be accused of disloyalty who voted wrong on these matters, still it seems to me that those who did so vote were wrong and might just as well admit it. The Republicans of the House make an excellent showing on all these questions.

The four preparedness votes selected were perhaps the best that could have been selected if four had to be taken, but it seems to me that No. 4, on section 56, should have been omitted, and I wrote to Mr. Harvey, the publicity director of the league, and told him so. I received a reply, dated August 23, from Mr. Charles D. Orth, chairman of the Security League's congressional committee, who is the man, by the way, who should be the target of criticism, if anybody. He explained that they had to select measures that "supplied an official record of actual votes," and added:

It is unfortunate that some Members spoiled their roll-of-honor record by voting wrong on section 56. Our view is that the thing of overriding importance was the essential and inherent principle involved, which should have governed the voting to the exclusion of any other consideration.

Section 56, you remember, brought in the question of the militia and the so-called continental army advocated by President Wilson in his message to Congress in December, 1915, but afterwards abandoned by him because of the open revolt of the Democratic leaders of the House against it.

A NEW HONOR ROLL.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to introduce a new honor roll by reading the names of the men who voted "yea" on the first roll call for preparedness on January 22, 1915. The motion was made by Mr. Gardner, of Massachusetts, to recommit the Army appropriation bill and add $700,000 to the appropriation for aircraft, and those who voted for it were:

Bathrick, Cooper, Curry, Edmonds, Esch, Farr, Gardner, Greene of Massachusetts, Guernsey, Hayes, Helgesen, Hinds, Hobson, Johnson of Washington, Lafferty, Lindbergh, McLaughlin, Mapes, Miller, Moss of West Virginia, Murdock, J. I. Nolan, Parker of New Jersey, Peters, Platt, Rogers, Smith of Michigan, Stephens of California, Sutherland, Temple, Underhill, Volstead, Winslow.

There were just 34 in that first preparedness roll call, and it is worthy of preservation.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does the circular state that Mr. Hay, before the vote was taken, said that they had already appropriated all that had been estimated?

Mr. PLATT. This vote I have taken from the RECORD, not from any circular; but Mr. Hay did say that. Let me read to you what Mr. Hay said with regard to another motion of Mr. Gardner's on the same bill, a motion to amend the item for field artillery so as to appropriate for 120 new guns instead of 52. Mr. Hay said: "We have plenty of time before the dreams and visions of the gentleman from Massachusetts shall come about to make all these guns."

That was the attitude of a certain crowd in this House at that time, and some of them have not gotten over it yet.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. It has been charged by Members of this House that one of the industrious charter members of the National Security League hired a substitute in the Civil War.

Mr. PLATT. That has nothing to do with the attitude of Members of Congress on this war.

Mr. KNUTSON. Can the gentleman give any information as to the time when this official became so very patriotic and experienced a change of heart?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know what the gentleman refers to. This organization, I may say, is doing just exactly as the Anti-Saloon League and other organizations are doing with respect to the votes of Members of Congress. They are a little overzealous, perhaps, and so is the Anti-Saloon League. I disagree with some of their methods.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would it not be far better for the country if this gentleman had had a more patriotic fervor in 1861?

Mr. PLATT. I fail to see that 1861 has any connection with 1918. The National Security League is, generally speaking, all right and did a lot of good work before we entered the war in advocating preparedness. It is nonpartisan and composed of patriotic citizens who pay $1 a year.

And now I want to add the second roll call on preparedness, that of February 23, 1915. It was on a motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, to recommit the fortifications bill with instructions to report an appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of $200,000 for the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon:

Britten, Bryan, Danforth, Deitrick, Donohoe, Falconer, Farr, Gardner, Greene of Massachusetts, Greene of Vermont, Guernsey, Helgesen, Hinds, Hobson, Johnson of Utah, Johnson of Washington, Kiess of Pennsylvania, J. B. Knowland, Kreider, La Follette, Miller, Mott, Murdock, J. I. Nolan, Paige of Massachusetts, Parker of New Jersey, Patton of Pennsylvania, Peters, Platt, Plumley, Porter, Powers, Rogers, Shreve, Sinnott, Sutherland, Ten Eyck, Thompson of Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who fired the opening gun in this fight. He made a very strong argument, from his standpoint, against the prohibition provision contained in this bill relative to the manufacture and sale of wine and beer.

In the course of his remarks he admitted that he believed the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of whisky would be a national disaster. I do not undertake to quote his words verbatim. He closed his speech, strange to say, with a quotation from the Scriptures, which he read in support of his argument in behalf of the sale of intoxicating drinks. In concluding his speech the gentleman read from St. John, second chapter, first to tenth verses, inclusive. I am not a pronounced or recognized student or scholar of the Scriptures, but since hearing him I have deemed it proper to put some other passages of Scripture in the RECORD, which the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] perhaps for want of time did not insert. Let me read. I will insert proper references in the RECORD:

Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him and makest him drunken. (Habakkuk ii, 15.)

Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright.

At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. (Proverbs xxiii, 31, 32.)

Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath babbling? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. (Proverbs xxiii, 29, 30.)

Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night till wine inflame them. (Isaiah v, 11.)

Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink; which justify the wicked for reward, and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him! (Isaiah v, 22, 23.)

Awake ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine, because of the new wine; for it is cut off from your mouth. (Joel i, 5.)

Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. (I Corinthians vi, 10.)

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. (Proverbs xx, 1.)

Mr. Chairman, I desire to put these scriptural quotations in the RECORD in answer to the scriptural quotation read by my friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. CANNON. Which is the older in point of time?

Mr. RUCKER. I or the gentleman from California? He is.

Mr. CANNON. No; which is the older scriptural quotation?

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say that I knew in this splendid audience, composed of nearly the entire membership of the House, there would be some not conversant with the Bible. I have no reference to the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Some of the quotations are from the Old Testament and others from the new.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman has had ample time to study Scriptures. Some of these quotations are from the New Testament, current and everlasting, and are to-day appealing to me and you in behalf of humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BESHLIN].

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill, particularly the prohibition clause. Personally I favor moving forward the date to January, 1919, and if I have an opportunity I shall offer an amendment to that effect. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one minute. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] how many more speeches he has?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have promised the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] 10 minutes, and I am not sure about the others. I rather think they intend to give in their time.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to say to the gentleman from Iowa, and to others who have sought time on this side, that I would be very glad indeed if the gentleman could conclude in 10 minutes on that side, and we will try to do so on this, although we will have to insist that some of the gentlemen take a little less time than we promised them. I know that gentlemen want to get home, and unless you can cut some of this time——

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I asked for time, but I will record my sentiments by my vote and not speak.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's position is always big and fair. The gentleman from Texas wants only two minutes of time, and I yield that much to him.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER], intimated that I was going to vote for prohibition because my district was overwhelmingly in favor of it. If I were equally unfair, I might intimate that inasmuch as the gentleman stated there were—I have forgotten how many—hundreds of saloons in his district, over which, he said, he could walk in one hour, possibly that might be the reason for his sentiments against prohibition expressed upon the floor of the House, and also when he says that he has seen so much drunkenness upon Capitol Hill and that he is willing to confine it to the business elements of this hill. And by that, I take it, he so condemns in his indictment the membership of the House.

I am not that unfair. I might, if I wanted to be unfair, such as he was when he said there was so much dishonesty in the prohibition cause, call attention to the fact that nowhere has it ever been shown in the history of this country that the prohibition element of this country had used $156,000 at one time in an attempt to debauch the governor of a State; and at no time can it be shown that the prohibition element in this country, Anti-Saloon League, or any other part of it, has ever attempted to use $375,000 for establishing a newspaper to run in the Capital of the Nation with whole page advertisements and leading editorials in behalf of the liquor traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to state that there will not be any more extension of remarks on the other side.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when the Congress enacted the food-conservation bill, of which this bill is an amendment, a year ago last August, it delegated to the President such authority in the control of the further manufacture of liquors that the people approved of that action. Under that law it actually forbade the further manufacture of alcoholic liquors, and left it in the discretion of the President whenever in his judgment it was necessary to conserve food, to restrict the further manufacture of maltous and vinous beverages. That was generally acceptable to the people, but the Anti-Saloon League, not willing to accept that rational solution, precipitated this fight. When this bill was originally under consideration in the House an amendment seeking to compel the President to exercise the authority forbidding the further use of grain in the manufacture of maltous beverages was presented and voted in the bill. The bill went to the Senate. The Anti-Saloon Leaguers got busy. They began to proselyte throughout the country, to cause messages by the hundreds to be sent to Senators, and as the result there passed without a roll call the amendment that we have under consideration, that forbids the further manufacture of beer after May the first next, and the further sale of any kind of liquor, whether it is maltous or alcoholic, after June 30 next.

I contend that the statesmanlike position in the consideration of this question was the decision of Congress last year when we referred it to the President to determine what should be the policy as to the further manufacture of maltous and vinous beverages. For when we pass this amendment, which under the hysteria of the moment is going to be passed through pressure of the Anti-Saloon Leaguers, then you are going to confiscate hundreds of millions of gallons of whisky in bonded warehouses for which the liquor dealers of the country have given their bond and which they were assured they would have the privilege to take out of bond within eight years. With the increased tax on whisky its consumption is rapidly diminishing. To adopt this amendment absolutely prevents the further manufacture and sale of beer next year. Everyone knows that this puts a premium on the illicit manufacture of whisky and the surreptitious use of habit-forming drugs. Beer can not be readily manufactured in small quantities. It is accordingly a whisky and habit-forming-drug proposition.

The President, under Executive order last week, under the authority of this particular law of a year ago, put a ban for the present upon the further manufacture of maltous liquors. It provides that there shall be no more sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or other foods used in the manufacture of beer or near beer after October 1, and that between October 1 and December 1 beer and near beer may be manufactured out of the supply of malt and hops then in existence. But it says nothing, and rightly says nothing, against the sale of the beer now in storage or prevents the further manufacture of beer when it is no longer necessary to conserve food. The brewers of this country have accepted the decision of the President that it is needed as a war measure.

But there has been an insidious attempt on the part of the Anti-Saloon Leaguers to cast odium upon the brewers of this country because, perchance, the brewers and brewery workmen by ancestry trace their lineage to the alien enemy. I have heard Anti-Saloon Leaguers in my own community during the campaign try to besmirch the loyalty of the brewers in this great crisis, and even now the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], blatant prohibitionist that he is, seeks to cast odium upon them because they have loaned $375,000 to Mr. Arthur Brisbane to aid him in acquiring the ownership of the Washington Times.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at this moment. I will when I have completed this statement. I am not acquainted with Mr. Arthur Brisbane, but I know from statements of reputable people that he has for years believed that the one way to solve the liquor question was to have maltous beverages and wine substituted for whisky. That has been his fundamental belief for years and years; and I know further that one of the leading brewers of Milwaukee, whose character Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer has sought to besmirch by trying to label him as disloyal, said to me in private conversation, months before our Government entered into war, that he had no use for the government of the Kaiser. More than this, the brewers have contributed largely to the liberty-loan funds and to the Red Cross fund, and are loyal to the core in support of the Government. And yet we find A. Mitchell Palmer, the representative of the administration in Pennsylvania, who went out of his way to try to defeat several Democratic Representatives in this House who are a distinct credit to this body, in order to bolster up his cause, charging disloyalty to the brewers of this country, because, perchance, they contributed to the fund loaned to Mr. Brisbane in a newspaper venture here that would, perchance, reflect Mr. Brisbane's views.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. So far as Mr. Brisbane is concerned, I believe he is a loyal, patriotic American citizen. But the question I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin is, Does the gentleman believe that the loan of $375,000 without security is a business transaction?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course it is when you loan that money to a man with the standing of Mr. Brisbane for the purchase of a paper of the standing of the Washington Times from Mr. Munsey, who had invested his all in it. There is no question about it. Of course if the gentleman had the slightest knowledge of the Washington Times, he would not doubt it.

It is just like the transaction where Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, through his representatives, acquired the ownership of Harpers. There is nothing to the discredit of the brewers in it. There has been nothing antagonistic to the Government in the expression of Mr. Brisbane's views, and from the very start of the war he has been standing by the Government. And yet Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer has gone out of his way, without knowledge of the facts, to cast odium upon as loyal and patriotic a class of men as can be found in America.

That is the character of the campaign that has been waged by the Anti-Saloon Leaguers. They are trying to destroy this industry that has the backing of the majority of the people of this country by trying to link them up, because of ancestry, to the allied enemy cause. It is unfair, it is un-American, and it is bound to react against Mr. Palmer and every person like him who indulges in such unfair tactics.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that seven years ago Mr. Brisbane, at a public meeting in New York at which I was also a speaker, spoke in favor of wine and beer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Now, what does this amendment propose to do? So covert is it that it is not limited to the war. It seeks to restrict the sale until the demobilization of the troops, seeking by indirection to do that which Congress has no right to do. The brewers of the country yield to the judgment of the President and the judgment of Mr. Herbert Hoover, even though the latter is permitting to-day the sending without restriction of millions of bushels of barley to Great Britain and other countries to be manufactured into beer.

I know that Mr. Hoover is familiar with the conditions in Great Britain, because he has lived there for years. Perhaps he knows those conditions better than he knows the conditions in industrial plants in this country, and Mr. Hoover, if he is going to be consistent in his policy in issuing this order, based on conservation of foodstuffs, will impress upon the imported cereals that go to Great Britain the condition that they must not be used in the manufacture of malted beverages.

Moreover the leaders of industry know that beer is a valuable aid to workmen in the processs of industry and manufacture. Not until I had worked in a foundry, elbow to elbow with the laboring man, breathing the dust and the sulphurous gases, did I know what it meant to them to have a glass of beer, and what its sedative value was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I have three minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have worked among the toilers, and I know how they view it. You may laugh, you who have never brushed elbows with the toilers; but it will be the good fortune of our country if there will be no dissension amongst the industrial workers. I know they are true Americans. Those who know our institutions will accept this order as a necessity of the war. But they will also expect that the Food Administrator will treat the British workmen in the same way as he treats the American workmen and refuse to allow those materials to be sent abroad for the production of maltous liquors. The practical and rational solution of this problem is to leave it to the President to determine when war conditions demand the change. To make it mandatory by law is prescribing the will of dry States upon an unwilling majority in our industrial States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my surprise at the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] concerning the Washington Times in view of the fact that only on yesterday I read in the papers the following:

MY DEAR BRISBANE: When you were at the White House offices today I forgot to ask you to send me the Chicago Herald and Examiner regularly to my offices here.

I am sure you are going to make the same good Democratic fight in Chicago that you have been making in your paper in Washington, and I want to see just how you do it.

Sincerely, yours,

J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

Now the gentleman sees how he does it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 1: Strike out the following:

"Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in paying salary or expenses of any man who on account of employment in which he is or may be engaged under the provisions of this act has been or shall hereafter be certified by the Secretary of Agriculture, or by any other official of the Department of Agriculture, for deferred classification, or by action of any other Federal official or authority has been or may hereafter be placed in a deferred class under act No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, or under any act amendatory thereof that has been or shall hereafter be enacted."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. Will it be necessary as we proceed with the reading of the Senate amendments to act on each as it is read? For instance, as to this amendment No. 1—would it be in order now to make a motion to disagree, or will it be understood?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote need not be taken on the amendment unless somebody offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the precedents of the House, I believe the Chair ruled just that way. Each Senate amendment must be considered by itself as an entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the opinion of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McLAUGHLIN offers the following: "That the House disagree to Senate amendment No. 1 and the conferees on the part of the House be, and are hereby, instructed to adhere to such disagreement."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that that is in order at this time. An amendment instructing the conferees in Committee of the Whole is not in order, and I make a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the conferees can not be instructed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee disagree to the Senate amendment numbered one.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan that the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture is that all Senate amendments be disagreed to except the Senate amendment which deals with the prohibition question. So, I think, the gentleman's motion, while it may be in order, is not necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Committee of the Whole must take some action on these amendments. The committee does not take any notice of the report of the Committee on Agriculture, it rests with the chairman or somebody to make the motion. The gentleman from Michigan has moved to disagree.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me if this was being considered in the House as in the committee, amendment by amendment, these amendments would have to be disposed of singly if anybody demanded it. By unanimous consent we might vote on them wholesale.

Mr. LEVER. In order to save time, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all the Senate amendments, except Senate amendment 13, which deals with the prohibition question, be disagreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not in order; the Senate amendments have to be read and submitted to the committee.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent to read all Senate amendments, and then I will make the request to disagree with them as a whole.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will it then be in order to move to concur in certain amendments and disagree to others. I think under the rule each amendment has to be considered by itself.

Mr. MONDELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming that the House disposes of the prohibition amendment, and then all the other amendments are read without action, will it then be in order at the end of the reading to make a motion to disagree to all the Senate amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that each amendment must be dealt with as it is read and, if possible, before the committee rises, the motion about which the gentleman asks can be made. That is the custom.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I imagine that we would save time by proceeding in the regular way, and let gentlemen move to agree or disagree to the amendments as they are read.

Mr. TOWNER. There must be some action taken on each amendment. Without unanimous consent these amendments must be disposed of in their order. It is the duty of the chairman to move to disagree or agree to every amendment as it is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has moved to disagree to Senate amendment No. 1. The question is on that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read Senate amendment No. 2 as follows:

Page 2, line 23, strike out the following: "production of beef cattle, $105,000."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to Senate amendment No. 2.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read Senate amendment No. 3 as follows:

Page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the following: "making cottage cheese on the farm, $52,950."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to Senate amendment No. 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the preferential motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the preferential motion to concur.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. When that proposition was under consideration originally, I take it the strong sentiment of the committee was in favor of denying the Agricultural Department any appropriation to educate the farmers' wives in the manufacture of cottage cheese. The reason it was incorporated here was because of the motion made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] in dividing up the appropriation seriatim.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of fun and ridicule poked at the proposition. There is more in the proposition than gentlemen seem to understand. When this proposition was on the floor at the original passage of the bill, I submitted to the committee figures which showed that the making of cottage cheese could be made an important industry in this country. This small appropriation has been asked for for educational purposes, and I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is not a housekeeper in America that does not know how to make cottage cheese. There is no more reason for the appropriation of money to employ people to educate other people in the making of cottage cheese than there is in attempting to fly to the moon. It is ridiculous, outrageous, unjustified, and unjustifiable. The appropriation will be used for no good purpose. Every one knows exactly how to make cottage cheese. There is not a home in America that does not make it at some time or other. Why anyone needs to be educated in it and why we should add to the burdens of taxation by making an appropriation to employ people to do that work is more than I can tell, and I hope the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be adopted.

Mr. MEEKER. If they are going to take away beer, what is the use of cottage cheese?

Mr. MADDEN. It is good food and most people know how to make it and most of them know how to eat it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 53 ayes and 66 noes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventeen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number. On this question the yeas are 53 and the noes are 66.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it necessary now to make a motion to disagree?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I made the motion to disagree.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is lost which was equivalent to a motion to disagree.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 4, page 3, line 3, strike out the figures "$1,058,975" and insert "$901,025."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 5. Page 3, line 4, strike out the word "seeds" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seed wheat and beans."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree with the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 6. Page 3, line 17, strike out the word "seeds" and insert the words "seed wheat and beans"

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 7. Page 3, line 20, strike out all the language from line 20, on page 3, down to and including line 19, page 4.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 8. Page 4, line 20, strike out the word "fourth" and insert the word "third."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 9. Page 4, line 21, after the word "food" insert the words "including eatable nuts"

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 10. Page 4, line 25, strike out the words "general administration of extension work, $35,000."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 11. Page 5, line 1, strike out the words "home economies" and insert in lieu thereof the words "home economics."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi) there were—ayes 73, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 12. Page 5, line 8, after the figures "$6,100,000" strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 13. Page 5, following line 17, insert the following:

(13) That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation, and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits and removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, until this act shall cease to operate, for other than beverage purposes; also in regard to the manufacture, sale, and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other than beverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States during the continuance of the present war and period of demobilization, except wines which may be imported until May 1, 1919: Provided, That this provision against importation shall not apply to shipments en route to the United States at the time of the passage of this act.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such imprisonment and fine: Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this act, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the power conferred upon the President by section 15 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917 (Public No. 40, 65th Congress).

The Clerk read as follows:

House Committee amendment as follows: on page 7, line 2, after the word "demobilization" insert the words "except wines which may be imported until May 1, 1919."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in amendment No. 13 with the committee amendment which has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. Would it be in order now to offer a further amendment saying that the sale of wines and beer may be continued till the 31st of December, 1919?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee amendment should be acted on first.

Mr. KAHN. Well, a query: If the committee amendment is adopted, or, rather, if the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is adopted, does not that foreclose further amendments?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me any further amendment to the bill, if the amendment recommended by the committee is adopted, would be an amendment in the third degree and would not be in order.

Mr. CANNON. A substitute would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this is not an amendment to a House provision; it is a substantive amendment to the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already indicated he did not entertain the opinion which the gentleman from South Carolina does.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. Does the Chair hold this amendment would be amendable even if the committee amendment is adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think——

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, as I understand it, was to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. Now, if that is done, are not all other amendments barred?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion made by the gentleman from Mississippi was to concur with an amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Let me call the Chair's attention to this: The motion is to concur in a Senate amendment with an amendment. Now, then, if that motion is carried you have concurred in an amendment and that settles the proposition in dispute between the two Houses; it is not open any further; you have concurred with an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi read.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi has not been read and we will read that and see what it is.

Mr. SABATH. It is the committee amendment that has been read.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The Clerk read the amendment from the Clerk's desk a few minutes ago when I offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is, at page 7, line 2, after "demobilization," insert the following: "Except wines, which may be imported until May 1, 1919."

Will the gentleman from California submit his amendment?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. Let us hear this read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 6, line 10, after the word "after" strike out "June 30" and insert "December 31."

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on that amendment, if it is offered as an amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds on investigation that a motion to amend has precedence of a motion to concur. So the question arises first on the committee amendment as it is printed in the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] moved to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. Now, what I want to submit to the Chair is whether or not we can not have a division of that question and vote first upon the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the question is divisible.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. IGOE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment which is found on page 7, "except wines, which may be imported until May 1, 1919."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. After the committee amendment is voted on, will it then be in order to consider the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] or any other gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the next business in order——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I beg pardon for making this suggestion to the Chair. It occurs to me that the Chair is mistaken in holding that this is a divisible motion. There can not be any question about it, I think, for this reason: This is a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will interrupt the gentleman by saying that he finds the question has already been ruled on in these words:

A motion to recede and concur is divisible.

Mr. TOWNER. This is a motion, as the Chair will observe, not to recede from a disagreement, but to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which is a preferential motion, and it can not, as I believe, be divided. This is the position in which we are now. Of course, if the Chair holds that other amendments can be considered if this motion is adopted, then the very object and the very determination of this question is lost. There is only one motion that can be considered now, and that is the motion to agree to the Senate amendment with the amendment. Now, if gentlemen have other amendments in view, there is only one way in which they can be considered, and that is to vote down this proposition. Then they can offer their preferential motions. But, in so far as this motion is concerned, I hold it is indivisible, and there is no right afterwards to file an amendment to concur with other amendments, because we have concurred with everything in this amendment except this proposition that is now stated by the gentleman.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to ask the gentleman, for information, when we can vote on the proposition simply to concur. How can we reach that?

Mr. TOWNER. There is no method except to vote down this motion which has been made. Then any gentleman can move to concur or can make a motion to concur with another amendment. That is the only method.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is there any possible way by which the amendments of the other gentlemen can be reached?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly. The method by which that can be done would be to vote down this motion.

Mr. KEATING. A preferential motion. I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. There is no recession under it.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to recede is not in order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a unanimous consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. I would like to know if the gentlemen who desire to offer amendments to this section may be permitted to offer them before the motion to concur is placed before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that a motion to amend takes precedence of a motion to concur.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I submit this as a parliamentary inquiry. I did not take any time in the general debate on this proposition, but I have a motion to submit as an amendment to the Senate amendment, one that is offered in good faith, and I want to know when I can get an opportunity to do it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, may I say to my friend from Missouri that there is only one way out of this parliamentary situation and that is to vote down the amendment of the committee. I shall undertake to demonstrate that we ought not to do that, but that is the only way to get out.

Mr. IGOE. I have no objection to the particular amendment the gentleman is offering.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote comes on the Senate amendment and then on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. BURNETT. The Senate amendment as amended.

Mr. LEVER. The committee amendment. Mr. Chairman, the vote is on the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intended to say, and thought he did say, that the vote comes on the committee amendment to the Senate amendment. That is the first vote.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Under what rule does the Committee of the Whole vote to concur or not to concur?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the recommendation of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Then the motion ought to be stated that way. The Committee of the Whole can not vote to concur on anything. They vote on the amendment, and then they vote on the recommendation which they shall make to the House.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, if that is correct——

Mr. CANNON. The motion was to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. That was offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. There is a division called. Now, the vote would first be on the amendment that he offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois is right.

Mr. CANNON. Then the next amendment may be offered. However that is disposed of, it is still amendable with another amendment. Otherwise you can not work out the will of the House or the will of the committee in recommending to the House. So that it necessarily follows that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], when this amendment is disposed of, favorably or unfavorably, has the right, before the motion to concur, it seems to me, to offer another amendment and have that disposed of, leaving the amendment to concur to await the action of the House on the amendment of the gentleman from California or any other amendment that may be offered to the Senate amendment. Otherwise the hands of the House are tied.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, under the five-minute rule I would like to discuss this proposition for about one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the proposition before the House now is the amendment offered by the Committee on Agriculture, which is embraced in the words

"except wines, which may be imported until May 1, 1919." I do not believe that we ought to accept that amendment. I hope that this House will vote down not only this amendment but all other amendments and pass the prohibition proposition exactly as it came from the Senate. [Applause.] I am going to vote against the committee amendment for that reason, as I shall vote against every other amendment that is proposed, unless it is something that appeals to me very strongly. It has got to be pretty dry. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the impression seems to be abroad in this House and elsewhere—I have seen it in the newspapers—that this amendment was placed in here by the Committee on Agriculture for the reason that there are some treaty agreements between this country and some of our allies and that it is necessary to put in this amendment in order that our treaty obligations may not be abrogated. I ascertained this afternoon that there are no treaty agreements of any kind that the Senate provision violates in any way whatever. When I found that out I felt that it was not right for us to accept the amendment offered here, and I am therefore opposing it. I hope that it will be voted down, and I also hope that every other amendment will be voted down.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. I will.

Mr. DENISON. It was reported in the papers that the Secretary of State or some representative of the President came before the committee and wanted this amendment put in. Is that true or not?

Mr. RUBEY. It is true in part only. The Secretary of State sent some communications to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman from Missouri want to be put in the position of opposing the administration in a matter of this kind?

Mr. RUBEY. It is true that Secretary Lansing filed with the Committee on Agriculture communications from certain ambassadors urging that the importation of wines be not interfered with. The point I make, however, is this: That it was not upon the ground of any treaty obligations, and therefore it does not appeal to me.

Mr. DENISON. But I am sure that the gentleman from Missouri does not want to oppose the administration on a matter of this kind.

Mr. RUBEY. "The gentleman from Missouri" has a mind of his own, and he is not opposing the administration. I repeat, Secretary Lansing transmitted to the Committee on Agriculture communications which were received by him from the ambassadors from certain countries—Italy and Spain and one or two others—and asked the committee to consider them. The committee did consider them, and decided to report this amendment. But I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want to state in a very few words the reasons which actuated the Committee on Agriculture in advocating this amendment. Letters were written to the Secretary of State by the ambassadors from Portugal, Spain, Italy, and France, asking that this action be taken for the reason that they believed that their countries should be placed upon the same basis as other countries with respect to this matter. The Secretary of State transmitted copies of those letters written by those various ambassadors to the Committee on Agriculture, with a communication from him in which he expressed the desire that they might be complied with.

The only reason why the amendment was proposed—and it would not have been proposed otherwise—was because we believed it was best under all the circumstances to comply with these requests, especially when they came from two of our allies who are fighting with us the battles across the sea.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing these letters. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the letters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

ITALIAN WINES—READ AT CONFERENCE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1918.

The Hon. ASBURY F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith for the information and consideration of your committee a copy of a communication from the Italian ambassador at this Capital, in which, referring to the provision of the bill (H. R. 11945) prohibiting all importation of wines immediately after the approval of the said bill, he requests, for the reasons stated in the communication, that the provision of the bill in this regard be modified so as to permit the importation of wines to at least May 1, 1919, in order that Italian wine producers and exporters may have the same period of time within which to adjust their business as is allowed to American producers.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure from Italian ambassador, Sept. 3, 1918.)

(Very urgent.)

REGIA AMBASCIATA D'ITALIA,
Washington, September 3, 1918.

His Excellency the Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A bill now pending before Congress, H. R. 11945, contains, among others, the following provisions:

"After May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. * * * After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States during the continuance of the present war and period of demobilization."

The provisions in question, by prohibiting all importation of wines immediately after the approval of said bill, will unavoidably cause great losses to Italian wine producers.

While, in fact, American wine producers would be allowed a certain period of time for necessary adjustments before prohibition as to their production would take effect—that is, until May 1, 1919—Italian producers would see this market closed to them immediately on approval of the bill in question, so that no time would be given them to dispose of that part of their production of the current year for which in most cases they have already standing arrangements with importers of this country.

I can not conceal that in view of the importance the wine industry has in the economic life of Italy the provisions mentioned might have serious consequences at a time when it would be most advisable to avoid them.

Insasmuch as the provisions in question would not become operative, in so far as their purpose is concerned—that is, the prohibition of the sale of all alcoholic beverages until July 1, 1919—may I ask you to use your good offices to obtain that the time for the enforcement of said provisions with regard to importation of wines be postponed at least to May 1, 1919, so that Italian wine producers and exporters may have the same lapse of time to adjust their business that is to be allowed to American producers.

Assuring you of my deep appreciation for the interest which I am sure you will take in this matter, I avail myself of the opportunity to renew to you, my dear Mr. Secretary, the assurances of my highest consideration.

MACCHI DI CELLERE.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1918.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter of the 4th instant, inclosing a copy of a communication from the Italian ambassador, relative to the importation of Italian wines, is received.

I shall give this matter careful consideration when the bill (H. R. 11945) to which this matter, in the form of a Senate amendment, is attached goes to conference.

Thanking you, I am,
Sincerely, yours,

PROHIBITION—FRANCE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 18, 1918.

Hon. ASBURY F. LEVER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In connection with the agricultural bill now pending before Congress (H. R. 11945), I have the honor to inclose a copy of a note from the French ambassador calling attention to the serious consequences which the provisions of the bill might have in the economic life of France at a time when it would be most advisable to avoid them, and I beg that you will give your earnest attention to this statement from the representative of one of our cobelligerents in the war.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure from French ambassador, Sept. 7, 1918.)

SEPTEMBER 7, 1918.

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE: A pending bill (H. R. 11945), which has just been adopted by the Federal Senate, contains certain articles relative to wines and spirits which are of a nature to affect unfavorably in a large degree an important branch of French export trade. This pending bill contains notably two clauses which embody a difference of treatment between American producers and foreign producers to the disadvantage of the latter.

In the first place, while the importation of alcoholic beverages must cease until the end of the present war from the date of the passage of the law, all national production of these beverages is authorized until May 1, 1919.

The adoption of such a measure would, in fact, assure to the American manufacturer a kind of monopoly, to the disadvantage of foreign exporters whose stocks are reduced and who in addition have already in their disfavor the difficulties inherent to maritime transportation. There would be presented here an inequality of treatment which nothing would appear to justify. As long as the manufacturer of alcoholic beverages is permitted in the United States, I feel that I may request, for the producers in my country, a corresponding privilege; that is to say, the ability of importing their merchandise.

Next, although the pending bill forbids the sale until June 30, 1919, of alcoholic beverages destined for consumption, exception is made as regards the wines necessary for religious and medicinary purposes.

Now, either the collector of internal revenue to whom is left the power to regulate these sales will authorize the manufacturer of wines for these two purposes, and in this case no reason would be apparent why the French products, certain ones of which have from a medicinal point of view acquired a merited reputation, would not benefit from an equality of treatment with the native products, or these wines would be taken from the stocks existing on May 1, 1919, and there would be from that point of view also injustice done in not according to the French exporters the same delay in time as to the local producers to build up their reserves.

The regulation of the sale of alcoholic beverages in the United States works a considerable injury to French commerce. I do not doubt your excellency will deem that it is equitable that at least the prescribed restrictions may not result in creating special privileges and an indirect protection for the benefit of anyone. I therefore have recourse to your excellency and request you to be good enough to bring the preceding considerations to the attention of the competent committees in order that at least equality of treatment be assured in the legislative provisions now under consideration.

I beg you to accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the assurances of my great consideration.

J. JUSSERAND.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1918.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter of the 18th, inclosing a copy of one from the French ambassador relative to certain Senate amendments to the food-production bill for 1919 is received.

Under proposed amendments the importation of all wines will be permitted until May 1, 1919. Other matters mentioned in the letter of the ambassador will be considered when the bill goes to conference.

Yours, sincerely,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 16, 1918.

Hon. ASBURY F. LEVER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In connection with the Agricultural bill now pending before Congress (H. R. 11945), I have the honor to inclose a copy of a note from the Spanish ambassador calling attention to the serious consequences which the provisions of the bill might have in the economic life of Spain at a time when it would be most advisable to avoid them, and I beg that you will give your earnest attention to the ambassador's statement.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure from Spanish ambassador, Sept. 9, 1918.)

EMBASSY OF SPAIN AT WASHINGTON,
September 9, 1918.

The Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State of the United States.

MR. SECRETARY: The amendment introduced by Senator SHEPPARD in the "Agriculture appropriation bill" forbidding the sale of wines and liquors in this country after July 1, 1918, and prohibiting the importation into the United States of those products from the date of the approval of the act, but allowing home producers to manufacture them until May 1, 1919, will, if adopted, cause very serious injury to the economic interests of Spain, protected by agreements in force on the subject.

I take the liberty of bringing this to your excellency's notice with a request that you kindly use your good offices toward averting the adoption of the measures above indicated, which would be so injurious to the interests of the country which I have the honor to represent.

Thanking you in advance, etc.

(Signed) JUAN RIANO.

WINES—PORTUGUESE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 16, 1918.

Hon. ASBURY F. LEVER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In connection with the Agricultural bill now pending before Congress (H. R. 11945), I have the honor to inclose a copy of a note from the Portuguese minister calling attention to the serious consequences which the provisions of the bill might have in the economic life of Portugal at a time when it would be most advisable to avoid them, and I beg that you will give your earnest attention to this statement from the representative of one of our cobelligerents in the war.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure from Portuguese minister, Sept. 13, 1918.)

LEGACAO DE PORTUGAL NOS ESTADOS UNIDOS,
Washington, September 13, 1918.

SIR: You are fully aware of the great hardship that the immediate cessation of the importation of wines into the United States would impose at a very critical moment on wine-producing countries; and I note that, owing to your enlightened influence, certain modifications have already been introduced into the measure drafted in connection with this matter.

I venture, therefore, to hope that you will kindly cause the period during which Portuguese wines may be imported into this country to be extended to May 1 next, as has been proposed in respect to the wines of other allied nations.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

ALTE.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1918.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter of the 16th instant inclosing a communication from the Portuguese minister in reference to the importation of wines is received.

The proposed amendment to the food-production bill will permit the importation of all wines.

Yours, sincerely,

————— ————.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is in these words: "Except wine, which may be imported until May 1, 1919." The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] anything to say?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is in charge of this bill, and he has given to the committee the reasons which actuated the committee in placing this amendment in the bill.

As he said, the ambassadors of these various countries—Portugal, Spain, Italy, and France—wrote to the Secretary of State to use his good offices with the committee or with the House to allow the importation of wines into this country until May 1, 1919, setting out in these letters the fact that unless this was done it would create serious embarrassment to large industries in those countries. The committee felt that we ought to agree to that.

Mr. CANNON. Is that the gentleman's opinion, and has the committee so recommended?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If I may have a word, it seems to me that when our allies and neutral nations make this appeal, when it receives the approval of the administration, and when the committee makes the recommendation, the amendment ought to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were 103 ayes and 61 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 10, after the word "after," strike out "June 30" and insert in lieu thereof "December 31."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order for the reason that the action of the committee just now is tantamount to a concurrence with the Senate proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a different one.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not make a further point of order after the original has been ruled on.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is not germane in that the purpose of the Senate amendment 13 is to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors during this war. The distinguished gentleman from California has admitted on the floor of this House that it is not only the intention of this Government, but it is the expectation of this Government to bring the war to a close before the first day of December, 1919. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just adopted by the committee proposes to limit the sale of native American wines after June 30, 1919, and will allow a great quantity of foreign wines to come here to compete with the native wines. There are hundreds of millions of dollars involved in the wine industry of this country. This year's vintage alone in California will be valued at many, many millions of dollars. If you propose to limit the sale of wines to June 30 of next year, you should not have allowed a lot of foreign wine to come in and compete with the wine made in California and other wine-producing States.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The foreign wines are only to come in to May 1, 1919.

Mr. KAHN. And the sale of native wines is stopped by this legislation on June 30, two months later. It is physically impossible to sell even the native wine in the period limited by the bill. This amendment just adopted will mean the "dumping" into this country of enormous quantities of foreign wines and so prevent the native wine makers from disposing of their vintages. I submit by extending the time to December 31 there will be a better opportunity for the native wine makers to dispose of their products. Not alone will they be deprived of their vineyards in the future under this legislation, but even the crops they are now harvesting will probably entail a heavy loss. The crops are just ripening; the wine crushing has just begun and will not be finished until the 1st of December. It will take months for the wine to properly ferment, and I submit that unless this amendment which I have submitted is adopted the wine makers will not only lose practically the value of their vintages, but also the money which they have expended within recent months, amounting to practically $15,000,000, for the harvesting and production of this year's vintage. I submit that it is not fair to an industry that has been fostered by our Government, an industry that has also been especially fostered by the State of California, to put such burdens upon it. The wine makers should be given a reasonable time to dispose of this year's crop. My amendment will do that very thing.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the only question involved is a question of dates. The gentleman from California wants to strike out "after June 30" and insert "December 31." Therefore it is a question whether the House wants to extend the time six months more or not. If anybody complains of this in view of the sentiment throughout the land, and they have expended their money, nobody is to blame but themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division [demanded by Mr. KAHN], there were—65 ayes and 112 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 19, after the word "after," strike out the following: "and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the whole section because I think it is unnecessary and unwise, and more particularly because I believe it is unconstitutional. The gentleman from Ohio discussed one feature of the legal questions involved, but, I suppose, not very much attention will be paid to it.

The only power Congress has to pass this legislation is in pursuance of the exercise of the war power under the Constitution. I believe this is the only time it has been voted in either House that this war power should be exercised beyond the period of the war. And I am unwilling to allow this section to pass without voicing my protest against it. I hope that the committee will strike out this language, at least, because I believe it goes entirely beyond the power of Congress, establishes a dangerous precedent even if we had the power, and it ought not to be allowed to remain in the bill.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If I remember correctly the act taking the railroads over extended some 18 months after the war.

Mr. IGOE. Exactly; but I will say to the gentleman that there is a distinction between that act and this, and I will point it out to him. We do not take over a single railroad after the termination of the war. We hold roads already taken and pay compensation for their use after the termination of the war and for a period not exceeding 18 months, but this provision written in this bill not only prohibits the use of property during the war, but prohibits its use after the termination of the war and until the demobilization as declared by the President, and when that will be or when that demobilization will be complete no one can tell from the language of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not true that in passing upon regulatory measures the Supreme Court of the United States by way of dicta has held that the Government of the United States has the right to prohibit absolutely the sale of liquor by statute?

Mr. IGOE. No; it has said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BLANTON. In passing upon——

Mr. GORDON. Never held any such thing.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman from Texas is wrong, I will not say again, but he is wrong this time because whatever authority we have exercised over the liquor traffic has been exercised under the commerce clause of the Constitution. We are passing this legislation under the war power of the Constitution and we can not extend it any further than the termination of the war itself, and let me suggest to the gentleman what an unreasonable exercise of that power it would be to carry all of these war measures not only to the end of the war, but until every soldier who has been enlisted in this war has returned to civil life. There is not a man in this House, I believe, who would sanction or approve of such a policy, and it is for that reason I offer this amendment in the hope that notwithstanding the request of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] that we vote for this section just as it stands, that this House will use a little judgment and confine it to the period of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments?

Mr. GORDON. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, at the end of line 2, insert the following: "And provided further, That on July 1, 1919, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause an inventory and appraisement to be made of the spirituous liquors then on hand and in bond which has been deposited under the laws of the United States, and payment therefor at such appraised value to the owners thereof shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated or by bonds or Treasury notes of the United States theretofore authorized to be issued and sold.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GORDON. May I be heard just a minute on that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not indicate a wish to be heard.

Mr. GORDON. The Chair did not indicate how he was going to rule. If the Chair pleases, I can state my point in a few words. It seems to me that if it is in order for this body to pass a law providing for the taking of property then in the custody of the United States and prohibit the owner from withdrawing that property—in other words, if the Government, having made a contract which permits the withdrawal of that property at any time within eight years after its deposit, it seems to me that if we can terminate the right fixed by the contract that we at least could pay the value of the property, or of its use, which we thereby appropriate at its appraised value, and whether you agree with the policy of paying for property you take or not, it would seem to me that it is entirely pertinent and germane to the bill before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without discussing the merits of the proposition at all, the Chair can not but believe that the amendment is subject to the point of order and that it is not germane.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 18 and 19, after the word "after" in line 18, strike out "June 30, 1919," and insert, "December 31, 1918."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments to this paragraph may close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Too late!

The CHAIRMAN. The objection made by the gentleman from New York came entirely too late. The Chair had announced the result and had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania for discussion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to hear the Chairman make these requests at this distance.

Mr. CALDWELL. The only reason I objected is because the gentleman from Illinois was trying, I understood, to say something in reference to this provision. We all want to hear from the gentleman from Illinois on all subjects here, because he knows as much about anything that goes on as anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a great deal of confusion in the House at the time and the Chair will submit the question again. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto may close——

Mr. CANNON. I did not desire five minutes, but I wanted to offer an amendment to strike out certain lines which have been enacted into law.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent that all debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all other amendments to this section shall be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Not all other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the gentleman from South Carolina put his request.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out certain lines at the end of section 7, on page 7.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to discuss that?

Mr. CANNON. I want to call the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. LEVER. Let us make it 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. It has already been enacted into law. What do you want it here for?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BESHLIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has three other amendments here that he sent to the Clerk's desk. Does he desire a vote upon them?

Mr. BESHLIN. No. They all relate to the same subject matter.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso beginning with the word "Provided," in line 10, page 7, and the balance of the amendment, closing with the word "imprisonment," in line 23.

Now, just a word. I will not take the five minutes. That proviso should be stricken out, because it is already the law by a joint resolution that was passed by the Senate and the House without amendment and signed by the President—that is, the power to create zones about munition plants, and so forth.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it in the language of this proviso?

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that it is. Therefore it should be stricken out here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON offers the following amendment: Page 7, line 10, beginning with the word "Provided," strike out all down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 23.

Mr. CANNON. Read the words of the proviso that are proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this act, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 65.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi and Mr. CANNON took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent now to put the text of the law in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the leave will be granted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the law referred to:

[Public resolution No. 40—65th Congress.]

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Approved, September 12, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, is the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi debatable now?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question before that motion is put, and that is, that should it appear in the progress of the conference that a deadlock ensues, will the gentleman come back to the House for instructions before they let the bill die in conference?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. We do not intend to let it die in conference. We intend to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] to concur in the Senate amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 139, noes 29.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 3, amendment No. 14, strike out the word "fifth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion to concur.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, may I submit this request, that we read these amendments, and if there is no objection let the Chair announce that they are disagreed to and we will save time thereby?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, what is the motion?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to disagree to these amendments.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to make a preferential motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer an amendment to Senate amendment 14?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it up to the desk.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move that we agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SABATH moves to amend Senate amendment No. 14 as follows: After the "$500,000," on line 15, page 8, insert: "For taking over and payment of wines, vinous liquors, and distilled spirits in bond or in possession of retail or wholesale dealers and rectifiers after June 30, 1919, and for the repayment of prepaid taxes on all wines, vinous liquors, and distilled spirits in possession of retail and wholesale dealers and rectifiers, $250,000,000, or so much theerof as may be required; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the payment of all such wines, vinous liquors, and distilled spirits taken over under this provision."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this Senate amendment provides for a certain appropriation, namely, for obtaining market news on fruits and vegetables $500,000 is appropriated. My amendment provides for an appropriation of $250,000,000 to refund the tax which has been paid to the Government by the different rectifiers and wholesalers and retail dealers on wine and liquors that remain in their possession after June 30, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman read Senate amendment No. 14?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; in a way.

Mr. WALSH. Well, if he has, he will see that it simply substitutes the word "fourth" for the word "fifth."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It just changes the number of the section.

Mr. WALSH. The rest of it is not open to amendment.

Mr. SABATH. It is Senate amendment No. 14, nevertheless.

Mr. WALSH. It does not apply to the rest of the section.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I make the point of order that it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That portion of the bill deals altogether with an appropriation for gathering information. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is to appropriate $250,000,000 with which to buy these liquors. The Chair thinks the amendment is clearly out of order, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that we will not be able to pass this bill to-night. I want to ask the chairman if he can not move to rise in a little while?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say this: There is other legislation to be passed upon, one or two more bills, and then there may be a three-day recess, as I understand from the majority leader. We can pass this bill to-night in a very few minutes, in my judgment. We have finished the only really disputed points here in the House, and I trust gentlemen will stay with us just a few minutes longer and we will get through. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why does not the gentleman make a motion that the committee recommends that amendments 14 to 31 be disagreed to, and upon the vote upon that motion move that the committee rise?

Mr. LEVER. We undertook to do that, as the gentleman knows, at the very beginning of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. At that time the discussion and difference of opinion over the prohibition amendments were pending. Those are now out of the way, and I think the motion would be carried.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the Senate amendments, Nos. 14 to 31, be disagreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Chairman, the amendments have to be read.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEVER. Then I will ask unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Senate amendments from 14 to 31, inclusive, be disagreed to without reading.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the recommendations of the committee to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the committee do now rise and report its recommendations to the House, that Senate amendment numbered 13 be agreed to, and that all the other amendments be disagreed to.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That Senate amendment numbered 13 be agreed to with an amendment, and that all the other amendments be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideraion the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that Senate amendment No. 13 be agreed to with an amendment and that all the other amendments be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11945, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the Senate amendment No. 13 be agreed to with an amendment and that all the other amendments be disagreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And that the conference asked for by the Senate be agreed to. I submit that as a supplemental report.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is no part of the report.

The SPEAKER. That is not a part of the instructions.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. The statement just made by the Chair does not seem to be in accordance with the procedure of the House as indicated in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 6193. If that particular paragraph is followed it will be necessary for the House to take up the various amendments in order to pass them.

The SPEAKER. The procedure is exactly like that in any other case, and the business of the Chair is to ask if a separate vote is desired on any amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the Chair allow me to read?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL (reading)—

On March 1, 1831, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 528) making appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1831.

After some time therein the committee rose, and the Chairman reported the said amendments with amendments.

The Senate amendments were then taken up in order. When the Committee of the Whole had amended, the House voted on the question of concurring with the Committee of the Whole in agreeing to the amendment proposed to the Senate amendment; and where the Committee of the Whole, instead of amending, had agreed or disagreed to the Senate amendment, the question was put on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in this agreement or disagreement.

Finally, after the amendments of the Senate had been gone through, the question was put on concurring with the Senate amendments as amended.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely what the Chair said.

Mr. MONDELL. The Chair's statement, as I understood it, was that the question was on concurring in the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was starting to put the question whether a separate vote was desired on any amendment when the gentleman intervened.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me that it is necessary to take up these amendments.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing more sacred about these amendments than the amendments to any ordinary bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the amendment to the Senate amendment No. 13, regarding prohibition.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I demand a separate vote on amendment 13.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has demanded a separate vote on amendment 13. Is a separate vote demanded on any other? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is not the question on the recommendation of the committee to disagree to the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to disagree to all the amendments except to Senate amendment 13.

The question was taken, and all the other amendments were disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment to Senate amendment 13.

The question was being taken when Mr. BLANTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. Is it in order to ask for the yeas and nays on this question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a misunderstanding whether we are voting on the whole proposition to concur with an amendment. Is this on the amendment allowing the importation of wine?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the importation of wine as written in the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the Chair stated that the question was on the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Did not the Committee of the Whole report back Senate amendment 13 with an amendment? Is not that what we are voting on? The Committee of the Whole adopted an amendment which the Committee on Agriculture voted to incorporate in section 13, and then they reported section 13.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to be voted on be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to Senate amendment 13: Page 7, line 2, after the word "demobilization," insert the words "except wine, which may be imported until May 1, 1919."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Was not that amendment incorporated, including the amendment in Committee of the Whole, and was not the Senate amendment as amended reported to the House and not that committee amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole simply recommended to the House of Representatives that the language just read be incorporated in the Senate amendment.

Mr. IGOE. The recommendation was that the Senate amendment as amended be adopted. How can there be a separate vote on that particular amendment, which was simply an amendment offered in Committee of the Whole to a Senate amendment? How can there be a separate vote on that that is a part of the entire section?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the Chair a moment, I think the matter before the House is a very simple one. Where the Senate amends a House bill and it comes back to the House with amendments it requires consideration in the Committee of the Whole, and the House has to go back into the Committee of the Whole to consider them de novo. In the present bill before the House there were sundry amendments made to the bill by the Senate, and the Committee on Agriculture considered those amendments and made a recommendation reporting the bill to the House, and the House in Committee of the Whole considered each one of these amendments. All of the amendments have been disposed of except the prohibition amendment put on by the Senate. The House committee recommended to the House that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment providing that wines might be imported after a certain time. When the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union began to consider the amendments the question was to consider the amendment proposed to the amendment by the House committee, to wit, giving an exemption to the importation of wine until May 1. The committee recommended that the amendment be concurred in with an amendment, but the committee's action is simply advisory or recommendatory to the House, and the House has not yet acted on it. Now, the question is whether the House will concur in the recommendation of the committee to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. Now, if the House adopts such motion, that is the end of the matter. If the House refuses to concur in such amendment permitting the importation of Italian wine, then the question would come straight on concurring in the Senate amendment without amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee to Senate amendment No. 13.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If we vote in favor of this amendment now, does it carry with it the adoption of Senate amendment No. 13?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. BLANTON. When it does I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. When the time comes it will be sufficient. The question is on this amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to Senate amendment No. 13.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were—ayes 59, noes 131.

So the amendment to the Senate amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Now the amendment recurs to agreeing to Senate amendment No. 13.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 13.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. There is not before the House any recommendation of the committee that Senate amendment No. 13 be adopted by the House. No such recommendation has been presented by the committee to the House and it is too late to make that recommendation now, or rather too late to make that motion now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has just made that motion.

Mr. LONDON. I know, but the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House to the House was that we adopt amendment No. 13 with a certain amendment. In other words, I contend that the motion can not be divided now.

The SPEAKER. Well, the House itself divided it just by this vote which was taken. When a report comes in from the Committee of the Whole House the House can do as it pleases with it. The question is on concurring in Senate amendment No. 13.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 171, noes 34.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, there is not a quorum——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman raise the point of no quorum?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. I raise the point.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the count just made by the Chair showed a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it in order to ask for the yeas and nays on this question?

The SPEAKER. Not until the Chair ascertains whether there is a quorum here.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will withdraw his point of no quorum he can.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Two hundred and thirty-two gentlemen are present, a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the vote.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present and the gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Twenty-nine gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number. [Applause.]

So the Senate amendment No. 13 was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate amendment 13 was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to agree to the conference asked by the Senate and that the conferees be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the conference asked by the Senate be agreed to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. LEVER, LEE of Georgia, CANDLER of Mississippi, HAUGEN, and MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GRIFFIN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for two days, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 12429) to authorize the health officer of the District of Columbia to permit the disinterment of the bodies of Eliza Hill Bowles, Bernice Worthen Bowles, and Bessie Vivian Bowles.

CONSERVATION OF MINERALS, ETC.—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the disposition of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there might or may be an inadequate supply.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill which was passed Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the War Finance Corporation and Capital Issues Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the Bureau of Standards for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1292); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required for salaries and expenses for the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 1293); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12881) to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 801), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8828) authorizing the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Yonkers, N. Y., reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 802), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina: A bill (H. R. 12990) to authorize the Kingsdale Lumber Corporation to construct a bridge across Lumber River near the town of Lumberton, N. C.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 24, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for every tie that binds us to the great liberty-loving nations of the earth. We bless Thee that in this time, when our friendship has been forged in the hot furnace of a great world war, there come out of it evidences of sympathy and of brotherhood that find their just expression in terms of the beautiful. We bless Thee that Thou hast given to us an opportunity to pay our infant debt to the great Republic of France, and that we can report upon her shores legions of brave and heroic American soldiers who stand by her in the day of her danger and peril.

We pray Thee to bless all our allies. Help us with them, standing shoulder to shoulder in this greatest crisis of the world's history, to press forward under the divine guidance and with the divine blessing to accomplish the end to which we have committed our resources, that of establishing a world of freemen and of glorifying the name of the God of freemen. We ask Thy blessing upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I present a petition in behalf of the Colorado Medical Women's War Service League, an organization composed of the leading women physicians of the State of Colorado, indorsing woman suffrage. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLORADO MEDICAL WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE LEAGUE,
Denver, Colo., August 6, 1918.

Resolutions adopted at a called meeting of the Colorado Medical Women's War Service League, Denver, July 18, 1918.

Whereas there are no arguments for or against votes for women that do not apply as well to votes for men, and experience has shown that women use the ballot at least as wisely as men; and

Whereas one of the divine purposes of this war is the achievement for all nations and for women as well as men of the fundamental principles of true democracy—"that government derives its just powers solely from the consent of the governed"; and

Whereas the past four years have demonstrated anew that neither men alone nor women alone can win a war, and that if together they are to win this war conservation and right use of time, money, and effort in this country is as essential as the conservation of food for the needs and success of our Army: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we call upon the Senators of the United States to act at once, consistently with their admitted knowledge that the coming of equal rights for women is inevitable, by passing the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to the end that this Nation be kept in line with progress toward universal justice, and to the end also that such time, money, and effort now being devoted to the battles for and against the principles of democracy and justice as applied to women may be released for use in the winning of the world war for the safety of mankind.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to Colorado's Senators for use in this cause.

THE COLORADO MEDICAL WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE LEAGUE.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial from D. C. Shepard, of St. Paul, Minn., relative to the proposed revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of C. J. Olson, of Baudette, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on shoes retailing for over $12 per pair, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on clothing retailing at $50 a suit or over, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Continental Supply Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on nonbeverage alcohol, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4957) to establish the Lafayette National Park in the State of Maine; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4958) granting an increase of pension to John F. Haynes (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

COST OF PRODUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a resolution calling on the Secretary of Agriculture for certain information and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 310) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be instructed to furnish the Senate with all information in his department showing the cost of production of the following agricultural products: Wheat, barley, rye, buckwheat, corn, kafir corn, rice, apples, potatoes, cotton, beef cattle, hogs, hay, and sheep.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. KING. Does the Senator object to having the resolution go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that all the resolution does is to call for such information as the Secretary of Agriculture may have. I do not see any necessity for its going to the committee. I might have brought it up in the committee this morning.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator state that it will not require any investigation by the department?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not require any investigation probably more than to collect the information the Secretary has and send it to the Senate.

Mr. KING. I shall not object, Mr. President.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On September 10, 1918:

S. 936. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes.

On September 11, 1918:

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.

On September 12, 1918:

S. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

On September 13, 1918:

S. 934. An act authorizing the State of Montana to select other lands in lieu of lands in section 16, township 2 north, range 30 east, within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project and the ceded portion of Crow Indian Reservation, in said State; and

S. 2180. An act to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY (H. DOC. NO. 1297).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress summary of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the meat-packing industry.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 24, 1918.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

SENATOR THOMPSON'S VISIT TO THE BATTLE FRONT IN FRANCE.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, the all-important question before the country is to win the war. There is no other issue, political or otherwise. How to win it quickly and completely is the great problem, and is the only question of difference between men or parties worthy of consideration at this time. All other economic, domestic, and international questions sink into insignificance as compared with this. Realizing that the best way to understand conditions at the front and the needs and requirements of the Army and Navy to accomplish the desired purpose is to go personally on the ground, during the last recess of Congress I went on an official mission to the war zone in France and England.

I first visited all of the principal ports in France, including Brest, St. Nazaire, Bordeaux, Boulogne, and Calais, in order to observe the landing and disposition of the troops and supplies, and then endeavored to follow them to and through the various training camps and distributing points until they finally reached the trenches at the front.

In order to better understand the conditions and the exact situation at the front, I visited most of the principal points along the battle front for a distance of 426 miles, from Nieuport, Belgium, on the north, to Belfort, near Switzerland, on the south, including the following well-known places: La Panne, the present capital of Belgium; Nieuport, a destroyed seaport and summer resort within about 300 yards of the German lines, where we were shelled out of the city; the ancient city of Furnes, which has been almost entirely evacuated several times during the war and suffered the worst bombardment in its history last March, when the remnant of its civil population fled in terror across the fields to the children's colony at Leysele; the city of Dunkirk, which holds the record for being bombed, having met that fate over 400 times, and a portion of the population still remain in the city, which shows the tenacity with which the people stick to their homes and their silent contempt for and indifference to the German air raiders.

At La Panne, where we staid two nights, the German air raiders from Zeebrugge and Ostend pass over every night on their way to bomb Dunkirk and Calais, and usually drop a few bombs on the city; but it seems not to alarm the people. Even when Paris is bombarded by the big gun "Bertha," which occurred several times while we were in the city, business and traffic goes on undisturbed and nobody pays any attention whatever to it, except when the bomb hits, which makes a tremendous noise that can be heard all over the city, the people on the street usually take out their watches and remark that the next one will probably be along in about 20 minutes. We saw the famous old city of Ypres, which has stood out so long and so firmly against the Hun all through the war, although now entirely deserted and destroyed. On the day we were there civilians were not permitted in that vicinity, for the big Amiens drive had just begun, but we had the good fortune to be accompanied by an English officer who had charge of a battery at this point.

We later visited at different times Mount Cassel, the highest point in northern France, which overlooks the country for miles around; St. Omer; Amiens; Montdidier; Soissons; Fismes; Rheims; Chalons; Bar-le-duc; Verdun; Toul; Nancy; Luneville; Wesserling, Gerardmer; the old German city of Thann; and Belfort, as well as many smaller and less important places along the line in the vicinity. Belfort is the only city in that locality which held out against the Germans in 1870, and to commemorate its strength Bartholdi, the sculptor who made the Statue of Liberty which stands in New York Harbor, carved in red granite a mammoth lion which lies just outside the forts, apparently, ready to defend the city with all its fierceness. We made our headquarters at Paris, going to the foregoing places as opportunity presented, and also to other interior headquarters and distributing points, including Tours, Chaumont, Abbeyville, Montreuil, Versailles, Angers, and Rennes, and also various training camps, including Coetquidon, where, my colleagues will be interested in knowing, I spent two very pleasant days with Col. Luke Lea, former United States Senator from Tennessee, but now of the One hundred and fourteenth Field Artillery, and who was ordered to the front in the region of the present fighting the day I was there and no doubt participated in the great advance.

I also visited various training and flying schools, both in France and England, including the largest flying school in the world at Issoudun, which has about 5,000 enlisted men and about 800 officers and a total student membership of about 2,000, all of whom are American young men, including a number of Kansas boys. Here they are given about six weeks' final training and taught to use all kinds of planes, including the three different types required for all flying squadrons, namely, the fighting, or scouting, plane, called in the United States service the pursuit plane; the battle, observation, or reconnoissance plane; and the bombing plane. The fliers are divided into three classes and are permitted to choose service with the character of plane they are best able to handle.

I also inspected the largest aviation assembling plant in the world at Romorantin. Here is where most of the Liberty motors are being installed in the De Haviland 4 and De Haviland 9 planes, commonly referred to as the D. H. 4 and the D. H. 9. Some criticism on this side of the Atlantic has been made for the delay in the delivery of this character of planes, the erroneous statement being made on the floor of the Senate as late as last July that there was only one Liberty motor battle plane in Europe. The truth is, delivery of these planes was not expected earlier than the 1st of July, while, as a matter of fact, the first Liberty motor plane arrived, was set up complete, and christened on May 18, 1918, and they have been arriving over there at the rate of five to ten per day ever since.

Every transport on our way over to France—12 in number—carried Liberty motors and planes. Complaint was also made because we did not have as many as 10,000 or 20,000 planes over there, when, as a matter of fact, if they had been there they could not have been used, because there was not sufficient hangars or aerodromes to take care of them, or ample flying stations or fields from which to fly and land; and neither was there a sufficient number of fliers, or competent men in the aviation service to properly take care of the planes, or sufficient supply of gasoline or lubricating oil. The first five Liberty planes had the misfortune to land within the German lines by mistake, so the importance of having suitable grounds on which to land, and to know where to land, can readily be seen. It requires about 50 experienced men and 3 extra planes behind the lines to keep one man flying. While, of course, there was some delay in the development of this wonderful Liberty motor, which is not to be wondered at, but having produced the best motor in existence rather than adopting some inferior motor, it has certainly been worth whatever loss has been caused by the delay and will prove a greater benefit in the long run. The fact is, that the allies predominate in the air as they do in man power and in artillery. It is, indeed, gratifying to know, however, that the delay has ended and that planes are now arriving at the distributing points in France about as rapidly as they can be taken care of. I enjoyed a flight over France in one of the completed and thoroughly equipped Liberty D. H. 4 planes. These planes are regarded by experts to be the best all-purpose plane in existence, one that can be used fairly successfully for all three purposes required in a flight, to wit, battling, observation, and bombing. They are each modernly equipped, carrying a pilot who is armed with a Marlin machine gun capable of shooting 600 shots per minute, and the propeller in front of him so synchronized with the gun as to permit the pilot to fire right between the blades without hitting them, and also carrying an observer armed with a Lewis machine gun, which has a greater shooting ability, because it has an independent train and can be pointed in any direction. The D. H. 4 Liberty plane weighs about 3,800 pounds, equipped with pilot and observer, and carries 500 pounds of bombs, equally divided, hanging from each wing, and so arranged that the operator may drop the bombs in 50-pound packages, or, if he prefers, can drop the whole 500 pounds at one time. Each plane is also equipped with wireless-telegraph outfit, besides other modern devices for navigation and communication.

The Liberty motor is acknowledged to be one of the best, if not the best, motors ever made for flying purposes. A plane so equipped has greater speed, being a maximum of about 135 miles per hour, and can fly higher, which is one of the greatest advantages in a flight, than any other plane of this type yet manufactured.

It was also my privilege to visit the Handley-Page plant, in England, and on September 1 to enjoy a flight over the city of London in one of the large Handley-Page bombing planes, the type commonly known as 0-400, which can carry 20 passengers besides the pilot, and 2,000 pounds of bombs besides machine-gun equipment, fore and aft as well as in the center. The wings of this plane measure 100 feet spread from tip to tip, and the body is 65 feet in length, and the plane weighs without equipment 3½ tons and can carry in addition almost its own weight, so that it weighs when fully equipped about 6 tons and costs about $30,000. It has two 350-horsepower motors, both the Rolls-Royce and Liberty motors being used, placed on each side of the nose of the machine instead of directly in front, with platforms built so that the motor can be cranked or repaired in the air. It carries 300 gallons of gasoline and can travel about 800 miles without landing.

While this may seem like a big story, yet this plant is now turning out another plane twice as large and with more than twice the capacity, carrying 50 passengers, over 2 tons of bombs, and will be able to fly from London to Berlin, bomb that city, and return home without leaving the air. I would not give these facts, except I know they are well known to the enemy by reason of the fact that the very first Handley-Page plane put into commission on trial by the British landed within the German lines by mistake, and Germany immediately began to duplicate it. This, however, was a good thing for Mr. Page, for after a long, hard struggle to get recognition from his own Government for the production of this wonderful machine, as soon as it was adopted by Germany, it was immediately approved by the British, and now they can not be manufactured fast enough. I had the good fortune to witness several airplane battles at Chateau-Thierry, Verdun, Belgium, and along the English front near Amiens.

I also visited various flying schools in England, principally at Chattis Hill, near Winchester, where I took another airplane flight and flew over to a large flying school at Lecombe Corner, some distance away, and back again. We have 72 different flying schools in England in connection with the English aviators, both American and English flyers being trained and fitted for service, and from which place the flyers are sent to the front in France as they become proficient.

Special attention is given to the training of all young men for the service they are to perform before they are placed in danger. Every possible precaution is taken to protect them by our Government. There are six rest camps in England where those who disembark on English shores rest up before going to France to enter the training camps there. I learned of at least 14 different kinds of schools in France, as follows: Artillery, airplane and aero photography, observers, transportation facilities, blacksmithing and repairs, gas schools, machine-gun and automatic rifle, Signal Corps, French mortar, pigeon schools (training the handling of, and caring for, pigeons for messenger service), Engineers, camouflage, Army school of the line, and General Staff College.

While every young man is first put through general training for the work of his enlistment, yet even after he has gotten to the front, should he develop any special aptitude for a different class of service, he is taken out of the ranks and sent back to that school which will specially fit him for the particular service to which he is best adapted.

On August 4 I had the good fortune to be with the American troops on the battle field of Chateau-Thierry, the "Gettysburg" of this war, while the battle was raging and the Germans were being pushed over the Vesle River. The battle on that day was in and around the city of Fismes, and I had the special privilege, through the courtesy of the commander of Battery B of the One hundred and first Massachusetts Field Artillery, to send my respects to the Kaiser in the form of a 3-inch shell from a "French 75" gun. The shell was reported by the observer to have fallen about 5 miles away upon the enemy in the vicinity of a small place called Perle, within the German lines just north of the Vesle River. Here we saw the enormous movement of about 300,000 American and French troops, supplies and equipment, from the position they held the day before, pursuing the Germans in hot haste, who were retreating across the Vesle River and passing over the valley to make another stand near the Aisne River. This great movement of troops included hundreds, if not thousands, of trucks of supplies, ammunition wagons, big guns, infantry and cavalry, which were getting in position for another battle. We saw the awful destruction and desolation, the dead buried and the wounded hastily cared for and put in ambulances for the hospitals, and also the burying of many fine horses. The Germans left many dead and thousands of prisoners, and a great quantity of equipment, shells, and ammunition. Enemy shells fell all around, and we saw the little village of Mount St. Martin, about half a mile away, completely destroyed by German shells. I have here a map showing the location of all the German divisions and the names of their commanders at the time of this battle, from which it will be seen that Germany threw in against us 43 divisions, or about 430,000 of their choicest crack troops.

A rather amusing incident which might have resulted more seriously happened at this place. We were endeavoring to reach the city of Fismes, which we heard had been captured by the Americans, and while running along at a rather rapid rate of speed in an Army automobile, we passed the ambulances and were driving forward among the men, who were lying down along the roadside to prevent being seen by Germans or hit with shells. They evidently took our American military car for an officer's car, as nothing was said to us until an American sergeant ran out in the road and inquired in a loud voice: "Where in hell are you fellows going?" We told him we were going to Fismes, and he replied: "The hell you are; we have been trying to get there for days and have not made it yet." At that another officer came out and ordered us back to the line occupied by the ambulances, which we had passed about 2 miles back. Upon inquiry we learned we had gotten within about 1 mile of the German battle line.

Everything indicated that the Germans fully intended to bombard Paris at some point near Chateau-Thierry, for they had built railroads all along the road clear up to this point, and had piled heavy ammunition in cords along the railroad and in the timber and at every secreted point. It was estimated that at least 1,000,000 rounds of heavy ammunition in the form of 3, 6, and 8 inch shells, and some even larger, were left upon the field of battle. Here I was able to secure some valuable relics fresh from the hands of the Germans in the form of guns, bayonets, and helmets, now on exhibition in my committee room in the Capitol, which many of my colleagues have seen. This was the only time when I saw the American soldiers tired out, caused by their endeavor to keep up with the Germans in their retreat. They had gotten far ahead of their Army kitchen, and it was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day before it caught up with them, and they had not had anything to eat since about 4 o'clock the day before.

I was interested in the kind and quality of the food served upon the battle field, and I noticed that it was indeed a very substantial meal, consisting of coffee, two fine large potatoes with jackets on, a large piece of roast beef with fine gravy, a big plate of beans, and plenty of good bread, butter, and sugar, and a dessert of rice pudding. At the hotels it was difficult to get sugar, butter, or potatoes, but we were very glad to see that this food actually reached the soldier in the field.

We endeavored on this day to reach the grave of Lieut. Quentin Roosevelt, that brave and daring son of our distinguished ex-President, but it was still within the German lines. We returned a week later, and on August 11 were privileged to pass through the deserted and destroyed city of Fismes, and on the road to Rheims, just northeast of the village of Chierges, south of Chamery, and immediately west of what is known as the Reedy farm, we found the grave of Lieut. Roosevelt and attended the first religious service over the grave, conducted by Chaplain Thomas E. Swan, of the One hundred and twenty-fifth (Michigan) Infantry, who in civil life is rector of the Saginaw (Mich.) Episcopal Church. The Germans had carefully marked the grave, about in the manner they usually mark the graves of their own officers, by erecting a cross, with the simple inscription, neatly painted, "First Lieut. Quentin Roosevelt, July 14, 1918." The American soldiers later constructed a smooth wire fence around the grave, and erected a more substantial cross, with the following inscription: "Here rests, on the field of honor, First Lieut. Quentin Roosevelt, Air Service, U. S. A., killed in action July 11, 1918." I have here a picture of the grave, including myself and others standing at the head of the grave, which I will be glad to show any of my colleagues who may be interested.

On August 6 we visited the British headquarters and saw the great preparation for the big drive near Amiens, which the English began in earnest about August 8, when we were at the city of Ypres and were between the firing lines of the British and German artillery and could hear the shells pass over our heads going in both directions, sounding like a railroad train emitting steam passing over a bridge some distance away. The English artillery officer who was with us, however, was able to distinguish every shell, and would frequently cry out, "There goes a French 75," or "That is a German 77," or "That is an English 6, naval gun," which was rather a new and strange amusement for us. The only building standing in the old city of Ypres with four sides and any kind of a roof is No. 13, near the old railway depot, in which we went to take shelter from shrapnel which fell in that vicinity now and then. The last civilian to leave Ypres was the good Pere Delaire, who was curé of the Church of St. Pierre at Ypres, who stayed all through the bombardments, caring for the wounded and ministering to the dying, refusing to leave until he was absolutely driven out by the military authorities. He took with him several hundred little Belgian boys and girls, and he is now taking care of 131 little girls at Wisques, who are in charge of the Catholic sisters at that place. The little boys, by the aid of the American Red Cross, were sent farther south into France out of danger. Here I saw a little blue-eyed tot, 6 years old, whose father and mother fled from the Germans in 1914 and came to Ypres. Her father, a plain farmer, was killed there by a shell, and her mother fled with this little girl, who was then only 2 years old, to Poperinghe, where a shell came down upon the house in 1916 and cut off her mother's arm and wounded the little girl almost from head to foot along her entire body, but by the most faithful and skillful care her life was saved.

The Queen of Belgium is doing a wonderful work in connection with saving the Belgian orphan children, the wounded soldiers, and the destitute widows. At Vinckem she has established two schools, where there are now over 500 children brought together from the firing lines of the allies in Belgium. These children were exposed to gas and shell attack and in many cases their homes were destroyed and their parents killed. The Queen has also established a home there, by the aid of the American Red Cross, to care for the Belgian children under 4 years of age; and she has also established various hospitals for the soldiers at her own expense, in which she shows her great humanity and democracy by personally ministering to the sick and wounded.

At Vinckem or Wulveringhem, which are adjoining places, we visited the great hospital of the Belgian Red Cross, known as the "l'hopital ocean," evacuated from La Panne. This is the hospital of Dr. Depage, one of the most famous surgeons of the world, whom I had the pleasure of meeting. Our most distinguished American doctors who have visited Ocean Hospital say that it is one of the very best in the world.

Mrs. Depage, who lost her life upon the Lusitania, is buried on a hillside on the seashore near La Panne, in sight of this famous hospital, in accordance with her wishes, by reason of her great interest in the hospital and life work in connection with her distinguished husband. There is also located at this place the "Home Du Soldat," which is a large recreation hall for convalescent soldiers from the hospitals and for the soldiers in the camps near by. The Belgians, in all their distress, have not even neglected their little civil population in free Belgium, where at Leysele they have established a hospital for them in a small schoolhouse after it was shelled and bombed out of St. Idesbalde. Here sick civilians are placed, especially the more serious cases of diphtheria, typhoid, and tuberculosis, and also civilians who are wounded by bombs, shell fire, or gas. The Belgian minister of interior has also just built a new civil hospital in the barracks in what is called the "Doorntje," at the frontier near Hondschoot. In La Panne we visited the little baby hospital of Madame Rolin of the Belgian Government, for which the Red Cross gave the barracks enough money to organize and support it. The American Red Cross for Belgium have aided materially in all these enterprises by reason of the lack of funds in the Belgian treasury.

We saw the Bains Militaires where one German shell caused 70 casualties. The bravery and fortitude of the Belgian people is well illustrated by the true story of a little hunchbacked girl who worked at mending soldiers' uniforms and who was the only support of her aged mother and little sister, and who had both legs cut off above the knee by this shell, and when her old mother went almost into hysterics over their sad fate she told her not to cry, because she could still sit in a chair and could be a dressmaker and support her and her sister. Too much can not be said in praise of the fortitude and courage of the Belgian people. Complaint is heard now and then from those who seem to think that the Belgians are not as helpful as they might be, or who fail to appreciate the exact situation they are in. Bear in mind the Belgians occupy a different position in this war than any other people in all history. They first saved the day for France and England by holding the German beasts at bay until the stronger powers were ready for the affray. Most of their country was devastated and destroyed and nearly all their civil population—7,000,000 men, women, and children—were made prisoners more than four years ago, and most of them still remain such. Only a small strip of their country about 25 miles in length and on an average of only about 6 miles in width remains as free Belgium, but it is still ruled and controlled by the King and the army, who, right under the guns of the enemy, refuse to leave their beloved land. In other words, practically all the citizens are prisoners and the army and the head of the Government is at large fighting to liberate the citizenry. Remarkable as it may seem, the Belgian Army is as large to-day as it ever was, and it alone is holding its entire front line with the aid of the inundations of water through the great system of canals flowing from the Yser River. The army maintains its strength from the men who continually escape from occupied Belgium. Their bravery and patriotism is shown by the fact that it is well known that only 25 per cent of the men who attempt to escape are able to do so, yet the ranks are daily replenished.

So Belgium is doing more than her part, no matter what criticism may be made against her. We must also remember that the men of the Belgian Army for over four years have been within walking distance of their homes and can not go there, and most of them have not heard a single word from home for all that time, and they at the same time know that their homes and families are in the hands of the terrible Hun. This is enough in itself to weaken the morale of most any army and to cause them to hope for an early conclusion of the war on the best terms they themselves can secure; but the Belgians are apparently unmoved by the situation and will without question hold out loyally with their allies to the very end. In any event, this brave and unconquerable little nation of heroes will always have the credit of administering the first blow to the German Army, from which it never recovered.

We visited the famous old city of Verdun, where the French early in the war held out for so many months against the army of the Crown Prince. This is one of the best natural fortified cities in the world to-day, and illustrates under the present mode of warfare how important it is to have natural fortifications of hills or mountains, for there is no other fortification that can possibly withstand the terrible heavy fire of modern artillery.

Near Verdun, by looking from one of the observation posts, one can see out over what is termed "Dead Man's Hill," where so many men fell on both sides of the battle for months when neither side had time or opportunity to bury the dead, and this stretch of territory has been "No Man's Land" ever since. As a result, there are skulls and skeletons piled in heaps and strewn promiscuously over the field, so as to make the ground appear white as if covered with dust from human bones. It certainly presents a weird and shocking sight, and one is reminded of the scenes presented in Dante's Inferno, and is forcibly impressed with the vastness of the human sacrifices made in this awful struggle.

Verdun marks one of the early military mistakes of Germany. Regardless of Germany's much boasted staff organization, she has made more military mistakes and egregious blunders than all of the allies combined. The halo of invincibility which used to hover about the crown of the German staff is vanishing. Foch, Pershing, Haig, and Petain are blowing it away, and that perhaps is the most important result of the two months of continued victory which the allied armies have now enjoyed. Almost every calculation of the German staff has proved to be wrong.

The new staff organization of the American Army promises to be the best system ever conceived for any army, as we have adopted the very best features of the English and French as well as the German Army organizations, and have had the good sense to eliminate the mistakes they made, embodying in itself a coordination of all the best features shown by the experience of all the other staffs.

We have 1,750,000 men in France and have the foundation laid for many millions more if necessary. This ought to cause the Senators who denounced Secretary Baker in January last for saying that he expected to have a million men in France by July 1 to apologize before the public. His estimate was increased more than one-half. These pretended military critics should admit for once that Secretary Baker was right and that they were wrong. Regardless of all the wonderful scientific inventions for destruction of life and property, the final success of the war still resolves itself into a question of man power, which the United States is fortunately able to furnish.

Around Toul I had the pleasure of meeting the first Kansas soldier boys in the front-line trenches, where I found the original Three hundred and fifty-third all-Kansas Regiment, commanded by Col. Babcock, which forms a part of the Eighty-ninth Division, commanded by Gen. Winn. They were holding a part of the front-line trenches in the region of the present fighting. I had already seen the One hundred and tenth Ammunition Train, commanded by Col. Travis, comprised principally of Kansas boys, during the Battle of Chateau-Thierry. A little later, on August 21, 22, and 23, I enjoyed a visit with the soldiers of the Thirty-fifth Division, composed largely of Kansas boys, being the first Kansas volunteers of the old National Guard. The Seventieth Infantry Brigade is commanded by Gen. Martin and the One hundred and thirty-seventh Infantry Regiment is commanded by Col. Clad Hamilton, both of Topeka. Gen. Traub, the division commander, a Regular Army officer, told me that while he had commanded many regiments of soldiers yet he was free to say that the boys of this division were the finest lot and most efficient and courageous soldiers he had ever had under his command.

Gen. Martin is a great favorite with all the men and has the very highest standing as a commanding officer. This division is holding a sector of the front-line trenches, all on German soil in Alsace-Lorraine. I would not give the names of these divisions and commanders except that I know the enemy is fully aware of what I have said, through her spy system. Our armies know, through what we are pleased to term our "intelligence system," the approximate location, together with the names of the commanders, of every division of the German Army. The gaining of this information, when applied to us, we call it the "intelligence system," but when applied to the enemy we call it the "spy system." This map, made up from such intelligence, shows approximately the location of every German division along the firing line at the time of the battle of Chateau-Thierry and at the commencement of the drive by the British near Amiens. It certainly demonstrates a thorough and intelligent system on our part; and the fact that when the Twenty-sixth Division of our Army was replaced by the Thirty-fifth Division the Germans put up a sign opposite the position on which were the following words, "Good-by, Twenty-sixth Division; welcome, Thirty-fifth," shows that they also know what is being done on our side of the line.

It was indeed a pleasure to observe the bountiful crops everywhere in France and England. Nearly every farmer raised some wheat, and the production seemed marvelous, and every strip of ground, no matter how small, even along the railroad tracks, was planted to some kind of food crops. All the farm work is performed by the women, children, old men, and cripples who have been wounded and discharged from the service. There appeared to be food and supplies enough for the civil population and the armies to last for many months, even though we should fail to supply a single pound. There was also plenty of substantial food to eat in the country and no particular difficulty to obtain the necessaries of life at a reasonable price, no higher than in most places in the United States, but nowhere in either France or England were the prices of food products as high as in the city of Washington.

The spirit of our American boys is certainly fine. They all appeared well, happy, and thoroughly contented. The only impatience or dissatisfaction shown was in their delay to get to the front. Everybody in the service after he is over there a short time wants to get right to the front. There was some complaint regarding the delay in receiving the mail, and I was glad to be able to render some service in helping to straighten out that difficulty, so that, instead of its taking two or three months to exchange letters at home, I fully hope and expect in the near future that it will require less than half that time. A noted general once said that, second to food, mail was next in importance to preserve the morale of an army, and special attention must be given this subject until it is properly worked out so that every soldier may get his mail at the very earliest possible moment, just the same as he requires his food on time.

There was also some complaint among the American soldiers about not receiving their pay on the day it was due, but I found in most cases it was because the soldier was away from his regiment on pay day; but I was glad to take up this matter with the authorities and I am now reliably informed that a system has been adopted, or will be soon, by which a soldier can draw his pay, with proper papers, wherever he may be on pay day. This will be a decided advantage, and if it has not already been adopted, it should be at the earliest possible moment, as no American soldier boy under any circumstances should be put in a position of having to borrow money or beg while there is something due him from his Government.

As I have already indicated, the American Red Cross are doing a wonderful work and also the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, and the Salvation Army. There is quite a spirit of rivalry among these various organizations, and each has its champion, and sometimes there is a little complaint against one and sometimes another, except that the opinion is unanimous on the Christian and merciful work done by the Salvation Army where its members, including the women, go right to the front and supply little necessities without price and minister to the wounded and dying without publicity or the hope of reward in this world. While some contend that this humanitarian work should all be united under one general head, yet from all I could see and learn they all fill a particular place, and knowing that too much of this kind of work can not be done, there would seem to be an advantage in as many organizations going forward with it as possible, and the little friendly rivalry between them only aids in their efficiency.

Too much can not be said in praise of the good work of the many wonderful hospitals throughout France and the great skill of the many surgeons, as well as the extreme care, patience, and devotion of the thousands of nurses. There are what are called three-line hospitals. First, the front line on the battle field, the second a little farther back behind the battle field, and the third still farther back in the interior in perfect safety. I was told by those in charge of the third-line hospitals, who carefully kept their records in each case, that of the patients who reached the third-line hospitals alive they lose only 1 per cent by death, and that they were able to actually put back into service 80 per cent of those treated for wounds. They are greatly in need of many more nurses, assistant nurses, and skilled surgeons, and a special effort should be made to supply them. I saw an advertisement in France calling for 50,000 more nurses, which shows the great necessity therefor. Wives and sisters of soldiers between the ages of 21 and 25 years are now admitted for nurse service and graduate nurses are rarely ever limited as to age. They are all under Army control and regulations and may be tried, disciplined, and court-martialed just the same as a soldier, and there is no reason why the United States should not adopt the same rule as our allies and grant military rank to those who enlist, the same as they do for soldiers. English skilled nurses receive the rank of first lieutenant. The pay averages about $60 per month for overseas work, with clothing and board furnished.

After this special opportunity for observation and a fair consideration of the situation and conditions personally on the ground from almost every angle, the best message I can bring to the people of this country is the fact that the morale of the allied armies is at its best and highest point, and the morale of the German and Austrian armies is at its worst and lowest point since the commencement of the war. Undoubted evidence exists that the spirit of the German troops, taken as a whole, was never lower; and this is only natural in view of the destruction of the hopes of brilliant victory and almost immediate peace with which they were buoyed up by their leaders early in the year. I think it can safely be said that the final turning point has arrived, and that for the first time since the beginning of the war it has filtered through the slow and stubborn minds of the rank and file of the German army that they are fighting a hopeless cause, and for the first time our allied armies are convinced beyond all doubt that they are fighting a winning cause, and that victory is all but within their grasp. The principal reason for this, I am proud to say, as freely expressed by our allies themselves, is the entrance of the United States into the war. We entered the war just at the right time, at the psychological moment to do the most good. The allies were extremely tired and discouraged, but the sight of hundreds of thousands of American boys coming to their aid with their fresh, vigorous, and courageous manhood, gave them exactly the assistance they needed, for renewed courage and positive hope of final victory. It is conceded by all that we put, to use slang phrases which are most forcible and expressive, the "pep" into the war, and "started the ball to rolling" toward Berlin. While there are many men of high standing, with full knowledge and large control of affairs, who believe that the war can be ended this year, yet the consensus of opinion is that it will still require about one year longer of most active, aggressive, and vigorous warfare to bring about that complete and overwhelming victory which the allied armies and the people of the respective allied countries now demand. It can be no makeshift, compromise, or halfway peace, but must be final and conclusive and destroy forever Kaiserism and militarism throughout the world. America will then have performed her duty to the liberty-loving people of the world, and will have maintained her reputation among them, as that bright and shining star which appeared in the heavens at the most critical time in all history, shining forth in radiant light the words of the Savior of the world with such brilliancy that they may be seen the world over by all future generations, "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Ga.
Benet	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Kellogg	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Kendrick	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Penrose	Sterling
Culberson	King	Phelan	Thomas
Cummins	Kirby	Pittman	Thompson
Curtis	Lewis	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	Lodge	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Drew	McCumber	Robinson	Walsh
Fernald	McKellar	Shafroth	Warren
Fletcher	McNary	Sheppard	Wilfley
Gulon	Martin, Va.	Shields	Williams
Hale	Myers	Simmons

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], occasioned by illness, and that of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as arrangements have been made for the ceremonies at 1 o'clock in connection with the presentation of the vases by the French Republic, I am going to move for a recess; but I will state the reason for the roll call. I think this is a national occasion, and it is very important that there should be as many Senators as possible present in recognition of this international event.

As we shall take a recess for that purpose, and I know of no pressing business, I move that the Senate recess until 12 o'clock meridian on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

GIFT FROM THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will request Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. LODGE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. MCCUMBER to repair to the Vice President's room and escort the French ambassador to the Chamber.

The French ambassador, M. Jusserand, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms and the Secretary of the Senate, was escorted to the Chamber by the committee named by the Vice President, and he was seated on the right of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Senate resolution heretofore adopted.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 305, submitted by Mr. POMERENE on the 17th instant and agreed to by the Senate on that day, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States has received with deep satisfaction the communication of the ambassador of the French Republic to the United States conveying the desire of the French Government to present to the Senate two vases from the National Manufacture of Sevres.

Resolved, That this offer is accepted with the highest appreciation of the gift and of the spirit in which it is presented, and that the 24th day of September, 1918, at the hour of 1 o'clock post meridian, is hereby set apart for the purpose of formally and officially accepting such gift.

Resolved, That the French ambassador be notified of this action of the Senate and requested to attend as the representative of his Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Gentlemen of the Senate, the ambassador of the French Republic to the United States. [Great applause.]

ADDRESS BY M. JULES J. JUSSERAND, AMBASSADOR OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC TO THE UNITED STATES.

M. JUSSERAND. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, as a token of gratitude for the reception granted by this assembly to a few representative Frenchmen sent last year in order to welcome America to the ranks of the active defenders of right, these vases are offered to the Senate. Commemorating a modern event, they are themselves modern and come from that Sevres manufacture, near Paris, where mementos of America abound, recalling the perpetual friendship between our two countries, busts of Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Lincoln, Lafayette. [Applause.]

The decision of the President and of Congress to take part in the war had sent a thrill of joy throughout France, not simply because of the aid but because of the justification. Our faith that our living and our dead had made their manifold sacrifices for a supremely great and just cause received its most telling confirmation when, from across the ocean, the voice of this great Nation was heard above the din of battle, saying, from now on "until the last gun is fired," until right triumphs, not for a time but for all times, we take our place by your side. [Applause.]

Our great thinker, Pascal, once drew up this aphorism: "Justice without force is powerless; force without justice is tyrannical." We wanted the mission sent to you last year to represent both; and it was led, therefore, by Mr. Viviani, minister of justice, whose winged, fiery words are still remembered on these shores, and by one who, at a solemn hour in the history of the world personated what President Wilson has described in one of his memorable addresses as "Force; force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world," Marshal Joffre, the winner of the Marne.

Of the two ways of expressing one's self, that of Marshal Joffre, of Marshal Foch, who started from the same Marne a pursuit that is not near its end, of Marshal Haig and his admirable Britishers, of Gen. Pershing, who has given back to France a portion of France, and of their companions in arms in Italy, Palestine, the Balkans, Siberia, is the only one our enemy understands—he has never tired of saying so himself—and since we want to be understood we mean to use no other. [Applause.]

We have to deal with a strange enemy; I shall not say a monstrous enemy, though, in fact, such he is. He can devise, he can not understand. [Laughter and applause.] That unique enemy can devise liquid fire, poisonous gases, poisonous propaganda, noxious germs to be sent by his diplomatic pouch to neutral countries, as happened in Norway and Roumania—after which he wonders he has no friends—an accurate shelling of Rheims, burning of Louvain, sinking of the Lusitania and hospital ships, perfectly appointed wagons to carry off loot, the efficient slavery of civilians.

He sometimes reproaches us for not knowing when we are beaten; along this line, let us confess it, we are beaten; along this line, and along no other, heaven be praised, and never shall be. [Applause.]

He can devise; he can not understand; he has no eyes to see, no heart to feel. He can not pretend that, while preparing his onslaught, he lacked informers in any country of the world. They were mostly of his own blood, and he concluded from what they said that when "der tag" would come Belgium would be found benumbed in fright, France in decay, England in indifference, America in business. The answer was Liege, Marne, Ypres, St. Mihiel. [Applause.]

They forgot in their calculations one imponderable item—sentiment. They could not understand that sentiment is a force, the greatest of all, in our days; that sentiment leads the world and has caused one nation after another, in Europe, in North, Central, and South America, in Asia, in Africa even, to come and say, "Till the end we are with you." Sentiment is the force behind those particular guns that shall win the day.

Of the value of this force we French are better aware than anyone, for it happened to us to sow the seed on these shores long, long ago, without thinking of the future, and behold, like the grain of mustard seed, it has grown and waxed a great tree. [Applause.]

They can not understand. Our attitude during the many years between the two wars was as unprovocative as it well could be, from which they just concluded that we must be in decay. Our policy was publicly expressed and acted upon, but they would not believe and could not understand. In an address of April 13, 1912, one of our statesmen on an occasion of international significance said:

> France will neither attack nor provoke, but in order to be assured that she herself will be neither attacked nor provoked, she must have land and sea forces capable of commanding respect.

This statesman was then prime minister and is now President of the French Republic, M. Raymond Poincaré.

The doors are shut, the curtains are drawn; with hushed voices select accomplices decide that "der tag" has come for the greatest crime in the world's history. No outsider can hear or see; no one shall know. Yet all the world knows, for the crime has cried to heaven, and the dark date of the Potsdam council, July 5, 1914, will be execrated throughout ages.

Any pretext would be good enough to justify the decision, for the true justification was to be success; and force moreover needs, they think, no justification. For the Serbs the pretext resorted to was the assassination of an Austrian Prince by an Austrian subject; for the Belgians, necessity which, as all burglars are aware, "knows no law"; for France, a pipe-dream accusation of our having shelled Nuremberg from the air. Force was so much to be the justification of it all, and so little care was considered necessary that, in their tragedy, the Germans played the epilogue before the prologue, and one day before they declared war on us because of Nuremberg they had begun hostilities. Their declaration is of Monday evening, August 3. On Sunday, the 2d, their horsemen had penetrated more than 7 miles on French territory, killed Corp. Peugeot, head of a small platoon from the Forty-fourth Infantry, a young man of 21, in times of peace a public-school teacher; their own leader, Lieut. Camille Mayer, was killed by us, and his tomb at Jonchercy will testify forever as to what the dawn of "der tag" was like.

The Kaiser thereupon solemnly declared in Berlin, "The sword has been forced into our hands," and all the echoes in Germany dutifully repeated and continue to repeat, "The sword has been forced into our hands; the sword has been forced into our hands." We knew from that moment what to expect.

In the dust and smoke of the immense fight the skies are sometimes beclouded and we do not know the time of day, but we feel that we are moving toward the evening of "der tag" and that evening will see the doom of those men who, even at this late hour, as unable as before to understand, still exercise their faculty of devising and methodically ravage, defile, and destroy the parts of France which they have to abandon, cunningly arranging bombs with time fuses that may kill people returning to their ruined homes. The hour of their doom is coming. [Applause.]

They now pretend their eyes begin to open and they "babble" of peace, the peace of wrong of course, the only one they can understand, not the peace of right; they still admire their Treitschke, who said:

> Small States have no right to exist, for they lack the essential state element—force. They have therefore no rights.

The four treaties they have signed this spring testify to this, being treaties not of peace but of bondage.

The honest nations of the world feel differently. They feel that "the small States of the world have a right to enjoy the same respect for their sovereignty and for their territorial integrity that great, powerful nations expect and insist upon." So spoke President Wilson. We feel with him. France has never thought of fighting for her own Alsace-Lorraine only; she fights and will fight to the end for the liberation of all the Alsaces-Lorraines still in servitude and in bondage throughout the world. [Applause.]

We are now at one of the grandest periods in the history of the world. We see sights never to be seen again; not only scenes of horror, but scenes of splendor. To those latter scenes American contribution is one of which you and your descendants may well be proud forever. Seeking, to use again the terms of your President, no conquest, no dominion, no indemnities, no material compensation, acting as "one of the champions of the rights of mankind," your Nation has stood the severest tests and offered a wonderful example. It is enough to say to her, "It is for justice; it is for liberty; it is in order that suffering people in far-away lands may cease to suffer," and the Nation to a man, to a woman, to a child answers at once, agreed and content. Not even laws, but recommendations, mere suggestions, are obeyed, for the cause is in their eyes a sacred one and all that can help it has for them something sacred. Immense loans are oversubscribed; the abstention from certain foods, the giving up of certain perfectly honest enjoyments are accepted with alacrity. How could it be otherwise when those men and women offer without flinching to the great cause the blood of their blood, the heart of their hearts, their own sons, to fight their battles over there. [Applause.]

And is it not a peerless honor for this country, the fact that the laws implying the greatest sacrifice or effort are passed by a unanimous vote? The law, for example, extending the draft age to 18 and to 45. A unanimous vote was recorded the other day in the House for a law increasing taxation by some $4,000,000,000.

What is now the time of day? Is "der tag" nearly spent? Foch, Haig, Pershing, and their peers will tell us when they think fit. [Applause.] All we need to know is that we are in, all of us, "until the last gun is fired," and why are we in? We are in, as I take it, in order to give its proper value to a document about as sacred to us French as to you Americans, and which recalls for us common souvenirs. It is to make good for the world the Declaration of Independence. [Applause.]

I shall add only one word, and a personal word. I want to express my thanks and say that I shall ever consider it as one of the greatest honors in a long career to have been privileged to address this august assembly. [Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Ambassador, who among the sons of the Republic can distill into the attar of language the love of the American people for France? Not I. [Applause.] Who, in a few figures of speech, can compute the debt of gratitude we owe the French people as with accumulated interest it has been transmitted from sire to son for sevenscore years? Not I. [Applause.] Who hopes that, whatever other crime our country may be compelled to face at the bar of impartial justice, it may not be ingratitude? All of us. Who hopes that, from "the Tiger" to the loneliest orphan in the stricken homes of France, there is not one who has a dream of the shadow of a doubt that we are with them to the end [applause], with them until the lilies shall bloom on all her soil, with them till justice wipes away all their tears and fears and avenges, though it can not obliterate, all the scars of all their wrongs? Every red-blooded American. [Applause.]

Dear Mr. Ambassador, beloved of the American people for your own sake as well as for your country's, the ghosts of innocent women, helpless children, and feeble age are calling to God, to America, and to civilization. Rest content. They do not call in vain. [Applause.]

I am not striving to weave a beautiful garment. I am only seeking to dress a great truth in the clothing of speech, however tawdry and misfit it may be. That truth is found in a story told of Mahomet. His first wife, Kadijah, was a widow. But she made of the camel driver the founder and head of a great religion. Then she died, and in his old age the prophet married the young, charming, and beautiful Ayesha. Consistently with human nature, she would sit upon Mahomet's knees, pull his gray beard, and petulantly ask, "Am I not a better wife than Kadijah?" Worn out at last, the prophet made answer, "No, by Allah; there can be none better, for she believed in me when all men despised me." Since far off 1776 we have grown rich and powerful and many seek our favors and many are our friends, but none can get closer to our hearts than France, for she believed in us when all men despised us. [Applause.]

Mr. Ambassador, you know us better than we know ourselves. Yet still I hope your judgment coincides with mine. All the conscious days of my life I have watched the attitude of this people toward war and warriors. It has been an intense hatred of war as an abstract proposition and a flaming, never-dying enthusiasm for it when it had for its concrete objects justice, truth, liberty, and fraternity. [Applause.] It has been a supreme contempt for the warrior who has waded through slaughter to a throne, and a never-ending burning of incense before the shrines of those who died for man. That sentiment accounts for our whole-hearted entry into this war. I am just an average American and my thoughts on these great questions, I venture to assert, meet the approval of my fellow countrymen. I never owned or wanted a counterfeit presentment of Napoleon; but I wish I might have seen Charles Martel. I thrill at the seraphic face of the Maid of Orleans. I look with love each day at the photograph of Joseph Joffre. [Applause.] And I hope the good God, ere my race is run, will let me grasp reverently the hand of Ferdinand Foch. He will conquer and survive, for, never fear, Bethlehem must triumph over Berlin. [Applause.]

I accept, in the name of the Senate of the United States, this touching and beautiful gift of the French Republic. I bid you convey to your Government our genuine appreciation of this thoughtful and unexpected courtesy. This legislative body had no small part in another far-off and, happily, almost forgotten war, in making a Union of indestructible States. May I express the hope and belief that it will be the purpose and endeavor of this Senate to maintain an indissoluble friendship with the people of France till the heavens are rolled together as a scroll. [Prolonged applause.]

I venture to assume that the ambassador will be glad to meet the Senators of the United States.

M. Jusserand took his place at the left of the Vice President's desk and the Members of the Senate were respectively presented to him by the committee which had been appointed by the Vice President.

On the conclusion of the ceremonies (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the Vice President, under the previous order, declared the Senate to be in recess until Thursday, September 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh, Thou great Father Soul, whose benign influence is ever going out to Thy children, to uphold, sustain, and guide them to right thinking and right living, help us to receive abundantly of Thy grace, that we may love mercy, do justly, and walk humbly before Thee, after the similitude of the Lord Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BOND ISSUE.

The following is the conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, the statement having been inadvertently omitted from the RECORD of September 23, 1918:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 805).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That subdivision (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"'(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and, for the purpose of strengthening, sustaining, and broadening the market for bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, of preventing frauds upon the holders thereof, and of protecting such holders, he may investigate and regulate, by means of licenses or otherwise (until the expiration of two years after the date of the termination of the present war with the Imperial German Government, as fixed by his proclamation) any transaction in such bonds or certificates by or between any person or persons: Provided, That nothing contained in this subdivision (b) shall be construed to confer any power to prohibit the purchase or sale for cash, or for notes eligible for discount at any Federal reserve bank, of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States; and he may require any person engaged in any transaction referred to in this subdivision to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY T. RAINEY,
LINCOLN DIXON,
J. W. FORDNEY,
J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. SIMMONS,
HOKE SMITH,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Amendment No. 1: This amendment is merely a clerical change; and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 2: This amendment is also a clerical change; and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 3: The bill as it passed the House amended the trading-with-the-enemy act by giving the President authority to investigate, regulate, or prohibit any transaction in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States and the hoarding and melting of gold. The Senate eliminated this provision. The House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment with an amendment giving the President the authority to investigate, regulate, or prohibit the hoarding or melting of gold, and also to investigate and regulate, by means of license or otherwise (until the expiration of two years after the termination of the present war), for the purpose of strengthening, sustaining, and broadening the market for bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, of preventing frauds upon the holders thereof, and of protecting such holders, any transactions in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States by or between any person or persons. However, this power is limited so that this section shall not be construed to confer any power to prohibit the purchase or sale for cash, or for notes eligible for discount at any Federal reserve bank, of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States.

Amendment No. 4: This amendment is merely a change in section number; and the Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 5, 6, and 7: The Senate recedes from its amendments to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, thereby restoring the House provision.

Amendment No. 8: This amendment is merely a change in section number; and the Senate recedes.

J. W. FORDNEY,
J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Managers on the part of the House.

CONFERENCE ON AGRICULTURAL STIMULATION BILL.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the Chair and of the House to the action taken last evening upon this agricultural stimulation bill (H. R. 11945). On September 6 the Senate requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments. Yesterday the House concurred in one of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. With an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment was defeated. They concurred in one of the Senate amendments, and then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] asked unanimous consent to agree to the conference asked by the Senate. It seems to me that the proper request to have been made was to ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, because the House had already concurred in one of the Senate amendments, and that amendment was not in dispute. The Senate simply asked for a conference upon the bill and amendments, and we could not agree to the conference upon an amendment which had been concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Of course the conferees have absolutely no control or jurisdiction over that amendment whatever.

Mr. WALSH. But the request of the Senate was for a conference on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is that not what the House agreed to?

Mr. WALSH. Well, the House agreed to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Senate had already asked for a conference and the House agreed to it. What else could be done?

Mr. WALSH. The House can not agree to a conference asked for by the Senate on a bill and amendments when the House has already concurred in one of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Now, why not?

Mr. WALSH. Because that amendment is not in conference.

The SPEAKER. Well, the conferees have no more jurisdiction over amendment No. 13 than they have over the operations of the man in the moon.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senate asked for a conference upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Of course. Here was the way of it: Ordinarily they would not have gone through this clumsy performance of getting these amendments into the committee to be considered. The rule is that if the amendment involved an appropriation, which was the case here, then, unless there is unanimous consent to the contrary, they go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] skirmished around here the other day for several minutes and tried to avoid going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. But somebody—I do not know whether it was the gentleman from Massachusetts or not—objected to everything that they asked, and finally the Chair referred the matter to the committee. They came back here with a report, and that went, of course, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. But I can not grasp the distinction that the gentleman from Massachusetts is endeavoring to make. It is too fine.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit me, I do not want to make any too fine distinctions. But assuming that the action of yesterday had been reversed and the House had concurred in all the amendments and disagreed to only one, would the Chair then hold that we should agree to a conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendments?

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably. If there is anything left in controversy, it goes to the conferees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Senate no doubt wanted to retain these papers, and the House asking for the conference, retained the papers. They added this amendment and asked for a conference with the House upon it, and the papers will remain with the Senate. That is the technicality that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is wrestling with.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is a very unusual proceeding for the House, making an amendment, immediately to ask for a conference. That is sometimes done toward the end of Congress because of lack of time. But anything in controversy between the two Houses must go to a conference. Now, when they go to the conference, simply the matters that are left in controversy are considered, and if the conferees undertook to modify this amendment 13 the Chair would hold it was out of order.

AMERICAN RED CROSS MILITARY HOSPITAL NO. 3.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. While in France I collected some facts and data in reference to American Red Cross Military Hospital No. 3, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain data which he gathered in France as to American Red Cross Military Hospital No. 3. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the data referred to:

4 RUE DE CHEVREUSE, PARIS.

The American Red Cross Military Hospital No. 3 came into existence officially by the publication early in November, 1917, of paragraph 2, General Orders 54, American Expeditionary Forces.

Prior to this time the details of the arrangement between Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who owned the buildings and who proposed to maintain the hospital at her own expense as a part of her contribution to the prosecution of the war, and the military authorities had been completed.

Capt. Walter W. Manton, Medical Reserve Corps, of Detroit, Mich., the first commanding officer, reported for duty, and began the work of organization and equipment of the hospital in the latter part of October. He pushed the work preparatory to the formal opening energetically and successfully.

During this period he worked continuously with Mrs. Reid, who was at that time in Paris, and devoted much time, thought, and money to the task.

It is a strange coincidence that Capt. Manton was at the time of my visit a patient in the hospital recovering from a severe gunshot wound of the left forearm, received while with his regiment on the front at the beginning of the present offensive.

The buildings occupied by the hospital are located in the Latin quarter of the city of Paris and are not only interesting because they have been a center of the social life of the quarter before the war, but also because of their historic associations.

The older portion of the buildings dates back more than 300 years. When this portion of Paris was the hunting park of the Luxemburg, this old building was the hunting lodge of the Duc de Chevreuse. There is a tradition that there is an underground passage running from the east wing of the old building to the Luxemburg Palace, situated a few blocks to the northeast.

Located within the hospital grounds is the famous "St. Luke's Chapel of the Latin Quarter," which has been renovated and is now in use as one of the hospital wards.

During the greater part of the nineteenth century the buildings were occupied by a boys' school.

In the early nineties the buildings were taken over by the American Art Students' League, "established by Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. William Newell in 1891 for the use and advantage of American girls studying in Paris." From this time up to the beginning of the present war the club formed the social center of the Latin quarter.

It provided not only sleeping quarters and studies but a fine circulating library, a popular restaurant and tea rooms, and a beautiful art gallery and exhibition room.

Just prior to the war a large modern building was erected providing much more commodious quarters.

Soon after the outbreak of the war the buildings and grounds were placed at the disposal of the French Red Cross, who converted it into a military hospital, L'Hospital Auxiliaire No. 53, of about 60 beds.

After the entry of the United States into the war Mrs. Reid offered the buildings and grounds for use as a hospital of officers of the allied armies.

The hospital was opened and received its first patient on the 12th of December, 1917.

At this time there were accommodations for 50 patients in single and double rooms. It was beautifully and artistically, even luxuriously furnished, has ample recreation facilities, a large, well-equipped library and reading room, which is kept well supplied with American, English, and French magazines, periodicals, and daily papers.

In addition, there is a large reception room containing a Steinway concert grand piano, and a lounge room provided with games, card tables, pianola, and victrola.

Every effort has been made and no expense has been spared to equip all parts of the building comfortably and in a homelike manner.

In January Maj. (now Lieut. Col.) Warren L. Babcock, M. R. C., superintendant of Grace Hospital in Detroit, Mich., was appointed commanding officer in succession to Capt. Manton. He carried on the plans already formulated by Mrs. Reid and Capt. Manton and continued to urge the construction work and the alterations on to completion. During his administration the staff was gradually augmented, first, by the assignment of Capt. Henry R. Carstens, M. R. C., of Detroit, Mich., as chief of the medical service, and Maj. W. Schier Bryant, M. R. C., of New York City, as chief of the nose, throat, and ear service. About February 1 Maj. Samuel Lloyd, of New York City, was assigned as chief of the surgical service. During Maj. Babcock's service the average number of patients daily was about 30.

In April Maj. Samuel Lloyd (now lieutenant colonel) was ordered to relieve Maj. Babcock, who was assigned to the command of Base Hospital No. 6 (Massachusetts general), and Col. Lloyd is at present the commanding officer and chief of the surgical service.

This officer has been a member of the Medical Reserve Corps since its establishment. He is the senior professor of surgery and senior surgeon of the New York Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital, and has also served as special professor of surgery at the Army Medical School at Washington. He was the first to detail the principles and to advocate the methods upon which all the modern surgery of the chest, now such an important part of war surgery, is based. He organized the New York post-graduate unit, now Base Hospital No. 8, raised the money necessary and equipped it for service. The first six months of his service abroad were devoted to planning and constructing the immense hospital at Savonay.

Since he has commanded No. 3 the hospital has tripled in capacity, and this has been done without overcrowding or relaxing the effort to make the hospital not only a place of care for the wounded officers but to provide a homelike and happy atmosphere.

Mrs. Reid has spared neither time nor money to bring this about, and in this she has been ably seconded by the commanding officer and his whole staff of medical officers, nurses, and corps men.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On September 10, 1918:

S. 936. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes.

On September 11, 1918:

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.

On September 12, 1918:

S. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

On September 13, 1918:

H. J. Res. 325. Joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917;

S. 934. An act authorizing the State of Montana to select other lands in lieu of lands in section 16, township 2 north, range 30 east, within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project and the ceded portion of Crow Indian Reservation, in said State; and

S. 2180. An act to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States.

On September 19, 1918:

H. R. 12098. An act to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

On September 21, 1918:

H. R. 8004. An act authorizing the resurvey or retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter to a constituent of mine in answer to certain false charges, which state, among other things, that I voted against the declaration of war against Germany, voted against everything with which to fight the war, and that I voted to exempt my own salary from the income tax.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the Security League gone so far that it has reached the State of Arizona by circulating these false reports about Members?

Mr. HAYDEN. The false charges that I have just mentioned were not made by the National Security League, but that organization has circulated other misleading statements in my State, to which I shall allude.

Mr. STAFFORD. The same kind of reports were circulated in Wisconsin, by which the Security League, or others, tried to defeat the sitting Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]?

Mr. SABATH. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. HAYDEN. I made a request for unanimous consent to extended my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter which I have written to a constituent of mine in reply to certain false and misleading charges, among which are that I voted against the war, that I voted against everything to carry on the war, and that I voted to exempt my own salary from the payment of the income tax.

Mr. SABATH. Knowing all those charges to be false, and knowing the gentleman to be one of those Members who always voted right, I withdraw my objection. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY (H. DOC. NO. 1297).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President. The Clerk will read the message.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress summary of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the meat-packing industry.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 24 September, 1918.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on my record of votes in Congress and the political situation in the district that I have the honor to represent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on his votes in Congress and the political conditions in the Denver district in Colorado. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are these simply the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his intention to incorporate in these remarks speeches which he has made and which are already in the RECORD?

Mr. HILLIARD. No; not at all.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, next Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business in order to-morrow be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the leader of the majority if there is any program for the remaining days that has been arranged before we take the three-day recess that he announced might be taken?

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish Calendar Wednesday to be dispensed with to-morrow so that we can finish what is known as the Nolan bill, on which I understand the Committee on Rules has given a rule. Then, the Post Office Committee has a bill with respect to telegraph and telephone lines, and Judge SIMS has a bill regarding electrical power. I believe that is the important legislation that is on hand, and I would like to get one day for unanimous consent, if we can get it, this week.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I suggest that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] also secured a rule on a bill readmitting aliens who are serving with our allies?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I thought, in order to get those bills through this week, or perhaps to reach them next week, it would be necessary to remain in session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any assurance to the Members, many of whom have left the city and others of whom are about to leave the city, that these bills will be the only bills to be considered, except conference reports and appropriation bills to be presented in the near future?

Mr. KITCHIN. Those are all that I know of now that are very urgent and which should be passed before we undertake to take a three-day gentleman's recess.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there no way by which an understanding can be had so that the membership can know that these will be the only bills that will be considered? I think the House will be inclined to expedite those bills if we knew that those are the only bills to be considered and we could conclude them this week and get away.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. There are quite a number of measures of more or less importance on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Before arrangements are made for the recess I think an opportunity should be given for their consideration.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can dispose of these bills this week we may have a unanimous-consent day this week; or if not, then on Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would like to make this inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina: In the event that the business of the House is cleaned up, as indicated, and an agreement is made to recess for three days at a time, when is it the intention to call the House back?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that that recess agreement in all probability would hold good until the election.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Until after the election?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Of course it would be understood in the agreement that if any emergency should arise we would be called back.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the Senate completed the consideration of the revenue bill we would be called back?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; then we would be called back.

Mr. KEARNS. How about the appropriation bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said the other day, I see no necessity for the Members returning on account of the appropriation bill. They are now having hearings on it, and if the full committee reports a bill for $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000 we will understand it is necessary for the prosecution of the war, and I see no reason for the Members returning on account of it when they have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the recess begin in time for Members to leave when the fourth liberty-loan campaign begins?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not say as to that.

Mr. DYER. The Committee on Rules has already agreed to three rules for expediting legislation. The gentleman from North Carolina, of course, does not undertake to try to control the Committee on Rules and does not know how many rules they will bring in here. But they might bring in a hat full of rules. They have already brought in three.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course it is the right of the Committee on Rules to bring in rules for consideration of bills, and in that event we could not take a recess because one man would be able to prevent the making of a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Tennessee does not get unanimous consent for the consideration of his bill, which he has already reported unanimously——

Mr. DYER. He says he has already got a rule.

Mr. GARNER. I am referring to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. I understand he has already got a rule for the consideration of the bill he has on hand.

Mr. DYER. That will be four.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has is a very simple matter and ought to be passed in five minutes.

Mr. MOON. If the gentlemen will give me as much time as they are now taking up, we will pass it.

Mr. DYER. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent now.

Mr. MOON. I am going to in a minute.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. There has been a statement that the House might adjourn under an agreement with the Senate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but we can not tell what the Senate will do.

Mr. LOBECK. Would not that be preferable to three days' recess?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not in a position to say whether the Senate would agree to it or not.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman intend to include in the legislation that might be brought in any important legislation suggested by the administration?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if there was any legislation which the administration thinks is urgent and important, the Members, of course, will be called back.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from North Carolina has had any talk with the Members of the Senate as to when we might take a recess?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have talked with Senators on both sides. I think the general impression is that it will take five or six weeks, at least, before they can pass the revenue bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And, in the meantime, when will the recess of the House begin?

Mr. KITCHIN. As soon as we dispose of the matters to which I have called attention.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Those will take this week and a portion of next week, will they?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think we ought to pass these bills this week, but if we do not we will have to stay here until we do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state when the military deficiency bill will be brought in?

Mr. KITCHIN. Some time the latter part of next week.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am inclined to think, as I feel now, that we ought not to leave here until a bill of such tremendous importance is disposed of.

Mr. KITCHIN. We are not making the recess agreement now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that; but the gentleman suggested that it might be well to pass that bill without bringing Members back, and I doubt the advisability of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman from Ohio recall any large appropriation bill reported by the Appropriations Committee that required a quorum, or in the consideration of which a quorum was called for?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have discovered the remarkable fact that the larger the bill the smaller the attendance.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a complete unanimity on the part of the House to pass the large appropriation bills.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that is true, too, but that does not necessarily mean that the House should not be in session and a quorum present. I would be glad to discuss the matter with the gentleman from North Carolina and listen to his persuasive arguments.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will take that up at the time we discuss the matter of taking a recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina this question: There is a bill on the calendar for Wednesday that would be in order when the committees are called to-morrow. What would be the disposition of this if the gentleman's request is granted? This bill was introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER], H. R. 10587. It has passed the Senate and been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands, and it provides for a water supply for the city of San Diego, which is very necessary indeed. If Calendar Wednesday is dispensed with, would there be a chance to get up the bill before we adjourn?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; by unanimous consent only.

Mr. RAKER. The committee would be called to-morrow and could not some way be devised by which if we dispense with Calendar Wednesday we could get up this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. I know of no way unless the House gives unanimous consent to consider it after the war measures are passed. If it is a meritorious bill, there should be no objection.

Mr. RAKER. It was passed by the Senate and has been reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, and it is indeed urgent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this the bill, I will ask the gentleman from California, which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] made some objection to and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] objected to because of the appropriation of a large amount of Indian lands?

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] made an objection to it, but I do not think the gentleman from Oklahoma did.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a bill that is contested.

Mr. RAKER. Not necessarily contested, but if contested we want Calendar Wednesday to contest it in. It is really a necessary piece of legislation, urged by the department. I do not like to object to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina, but I would like to have this bill disposed of. Would the gentleman consider a proposition that it be given a privileged status following the war legislation and appropriation bills?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say that that would be a matter, if Calendar Wednesday is dispensed with, for which the gentleman might ask unanimous consent. I could not guarantee to take it up, of course.

Mr. RAKER. Would the gentleman ask now that it be given a privileged status?

Mr. KITCHIN. If I did that some other gentleman who had a bill would want me to ask unanimous consent to give it a privileged status. There are other important bills on the calendar for Calendar Wednesday. I have asked to dispense with Calendar Wednesday in order to expedite these bills that I have mentioned which are urgent.

Mr. RAKER. This is an urgent bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I mean urgent for the whole country.

Mr. RAKER. This is urgent for the whole country. San Diego is without water supply; they have to go to an outside source to supply the Army and the Navy activities that are now there. It is urged as a real necessary piece of legislation. If the gentleman will assist me in getting unanimous consent for its privileged status I will not object.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection, and under the circumstances recited I think the House ought to give the gentleman a privileged status for his bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RAKER. For the present I will object.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12976) providing for the protection of the users of telephone and telegraph service and properties and funds belonging thereto during Government operation and control.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12976.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. NOLAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there is a rule to be reported on a bill here, and there are a great many Members of the House who have remained here in order that that bill may be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It will not take 10 minutes to dispose of that.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will couple with his unanimous request——

Mr. GARNER. It will not take a half an hour.

Mr. MOON. It ought not to take over 30 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. How can the gentleman promise that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can agree to withdraw it if it takes more than that.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this bill would take 20 minutes, but I can not possibly foresee how long gentlemen might want to discuss it. I imagine if there is any disposition to get through with public business quickly we will get through this bill very quickly and the gentleman from California will then have his opportunity. Now this is a very important measure, I want to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that the present telegraph and telephone employees of the country shall be subject to the laws that govern the employees of the Post Office Department. To-day they are not subject to any laws. If they default or take any money belonging to the telegraph or telephone service they can not be punished by the Government of the United States, and there ought to be a law passed immediately to cover that case.

Mr. NOLAN. Let me make this suggestion. This rule is ready to be reported, and a great many Members are here waiting until the bill is taken up. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that it follow House bill——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Was not there unanimous consent given the gentleman from Iowa to proceed for 20 minutes?

The SPEAKER. Yes; subject to the transaction of business on the Speaker's table, and if this bill is taken up the gentleman from Iowa would have to wait.

WEEKLY AND MONTHLY COMPENDIUM.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a privileged report on House resolution 434.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 434.

Resolved, That the preparation and publication of the Weekly Compendium and Monthly Compendium, compiled and edited by W. Ray Loomis, assistant superintendent of the document room of the House, is hereby authorized to be continued, published, and distributed as heretofore; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for, extra compensation to said Loomis at the rate of $125 per month, from and after December 31, 1917, the date when the preparation and publication of said compilations began.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe it is not privileged; that this resolution relates to the question of printing and should properly be reported by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PARK. It relates to services coming out of the contingent fund of the House, which makes it privileged.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, as I gleaned from hearing the resolution read, I do not have it before me, it involves an authorization of some publication that has not heretofore been authorized. The gentleman from Georgia presents this as privileged, saying that it involves expenditures out of the contingent fund. That does not necessarily mean that everything involving expenditures out of the contingent fund shall be privileged. It involves matters relating to the jurisdiction of other committees, and, as I heard it read, the resolution authorizes a publication that has not heretofore been authorized and properly should go to the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Accounts should not take jurisdiction of matters that relate to the Committee on Printing, even if it involves expenditures out of the contingent fund.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution again.

Mr. PARK. I would ask the Clerk to read the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the preparation and publication of the Weekly Compendium and Monthly Compendium, compiled and edited by W. Ray Loomis, assistant superintendent of the document room of the House, is hereby authorized to be continued; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House during the sessions of Congress, until otherwise provided for, extra compensation to said Loomis at the rate of $125 per month, from and after January 31, 1918, the date when publication of said compilations began.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin is well taken. The resolution involves nonprivileged matter which vitiates the privilege of the resolution.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, if I am not too late, the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is a matter for the Printing Committee is not well taken for the reason that the case involved does not provide printing at all, it is merely editing——

The SPEAKER. What is the use of putting it in unless it is printing?

Mr. BARNHART. Well, the Clerk of the House—it is a Clerk of the House publication——

The SPEAKER. No; the resolution says preparation and publication.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Speaker will permit, it provides for continuation.

The SPEAKER. Part of that resolution would be privileged, there is no question about that.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the printing and publication of this Compendium is now authorized. The Clerk of the House under his general authority has the right to publish these things.

The SPEAKER. Then what is the use of this resolution?

Mr. SANFORD. The reason is the committee saw fit to go back and allow this compensation from the date of the beginning of the first publication; that is the only purpose of this wording. We thought it wise to do it by this resolution so it would appear to the House why we went back to February 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear any more about it. The resolution as it stands is not privileged. If they cut this stuff out they might bring it back in the shape that it is privileged, and then it will be privileged.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. To submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire whether or not under the order of the House previously made the gentleman from Iowa is not entitled to recognition, in view of the fact that the order was that he should proceed after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Of course, I recognize the right of any member of the Committee on Rules to present a rule at any time, but would not the gentleman, in view of the prior order of the House, withhold the presentation of the rule until the gentleman from Iowa may be privileged to make his address?

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? There are some other gentlemen besides the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has also the same status.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is an order of the House, made yesterday. I have no desire to block the consideration of this matter in any way. That was the order made, and the gentleman from Iowa is here ready to proceed. It rests with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] and the author of the bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it, in case it may be considered after the speeches.

CLOAKROOM ASSISTANT (H. REP. 806).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is recognized to offer a privileged resolution.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 388.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law, for the services of two assistants to the messengers in charge of telephones in the majority and minority cloakrooms, compensation at the rate, respectively, of $1,500 per annum, payable monthly: Provided, That said assistants shall be in lieu of two pages at the rate of $2.50 per diem during the session now provided in the current legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the present arrangement, we merely have one annual employee in each cloakroom, respectively, at a salary of $1,800 a year. Now it is proposed to make the session employees permanent and pay them at the rate of $1,500 per annum, two for each cloakroom.

Mr. SANFORD. It is for the purpose of taking those positions that are now occupied in each cloakroom by a page and making them assistants to the messengers. That is the position occupied by Mr. Holt in one cloakroom, and in the other cloakroom by some one else, whose name I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. One additional employee in each cloakroom?

Mr. SANFORD. One in each cloakroom.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AUGUST BUEHNE (H. REP. 808).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 412.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $500 to August Buehne for extra services rendered the Members of the House of Representatives during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress as employee detailed from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House know Mr. Buehne. He formerly lived in Illinois and has been for a long time in the employ of the Government Printing Office and detailed to the House to deliver documents. This man, as I personally know, works long hours—more than eight hours a day. His salary, I think, is $900 a year. I think the service he renders, the long hours he puts in at his work, should entitle him to this extra compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is he detailed by the Government Printing Office during the year to the House Office Building?

Mr. FOSTER. During the entire year. And he looks after the delivery of documents, and all that, that go to the Members of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many other employees, if the gentleman is able to inform the House, are detailed out of the Government Printing Office?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the two men out here, known as the RECORD clerk and assistant RECORD clerk Mr. "Andy" Smith and his assistant, are also detailed from the Government Printing Office to look after the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any other employees besides those two? There are three messengers who gather up our manuscripts, that are detailed from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. FOSTER. Those two men are detailed, and we have always paid them extra compensation, and I think rightly, because they only get a small salary at the Government Printing Office, and we know what hard work they do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman certain that this employee only receives $900 a year from the Government Printing Office?

Mr. SANFORD. Nine hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. Nine hundred and fifty dollars a year. And he has drawn that salary for a great many years.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this is virtually an honorarium to him because of his work in the House Office Building?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What does this man do?

Mr. FOSTER. He delivers documents and speeches, and so forth, that come from the Government Printing Office to Members of the House.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does he do any more laborious work than other men receiving the same salary?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; he does. He works longer hours. Other men work eight hours a day, but he puts in many more hours a day than that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Was he not detailed at his own request?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that is true; but if he is performing good service we ought not to hold that against him.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He could quit if he did not like the job.

Mr. FOSTER. All the employees of the Government could quit if they did not like their jobs.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. What is the gentleman's name?

Mr. FOSTER. August Buehne.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. He is a very busy man. I see him there both morning and night.

Mr. LOBECK. He is one of the most faithful men in the House Office Building.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he is.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARTHUR LUCAS (H. REP. 807).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 409.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, $140 to Arthur Lucas for special janitor services rendered during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I only want to make a single statement. Arthur Lucas has been an employee for many years, I think 42 years, and a very valuable one, in this room over here. My office is in the northwest corner of the building. It requires care and attention. This man has cared for it ever since I have had that office, and he cared for it while Mr. Payne had the office. He keeps it clean and does everything that is necessary for a janitor to do.

Mr. GOOD. And he carries the mail.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. This appropriation has been made, I think, for many years to this employee, who certainly earns his $10 a month.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman absolutely certain that this appropriation has previously been made to this employee?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My information is to the contrary, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's idea is a mistake. It was made in the last Congress.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are four of these employees, two in the cloakroom upon this side of the House and two in the cloakroom on that side of the House. They are all drawing the same salary and performing the same service, with the exception of the service just mentioned by the gentleman. They are getting $70 a month each and $10 additional, or $80 each month. I do not think it is exactly equitable and fair to make a distinction between these four employees, two in the cloakroom on that side and two in the cloakroom on this side. Of course, the gentleman may be entirely correct, and doubtless is, that if this employee is doing a little extra service in cleaning up the gentleman's office somebody ought to be paid for it. But I submit that that matter could easily be arranged with the Doorkeeper, upon application, and a detail could be made from these four men, so that the work could be equitably distributed without extra expense. The only objection I have to it is this, that it creates a distinction between these four empolyees which it seems to me should not obtain. They all get the same salary now. They are all carried on the roll as the same kind of employees, and when you undertake to give one of them $140 bonus it seems to me it is making a distinction that ought not to be made.

Mr. CANNON. Do the other employees perform janitor service in addition to their other duties?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not informed as to that. I do not think they do.

Mr. CANNON. This man does perform janitor service, and has performed it and has been paid for it ever since I have occupied that room, and I am informed that was the case while Mr. Payne occupied it. He earns his $10 twice over, and if he is not paid from the contingent fund I suppose I will have to have the room cared for, and I can pay for it out of my own pocket.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, there is no one who wants or expects the gentleman to pay for it out of his own pocket, because it is an office that is here in the Capitol, and of course the Government will provide a janitor to take care of it. I submit that there are janitors here in this Capitol to-day who could be assigned to that extra service without putting any undue burden upon them, because many of them are not as busy as they could be through the day.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose in the House Office Building the rooms are cared for by janitors, and the janitors are paid for that service, are they not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are cared for by janitors and the janitors are paid. I am not contending—and I want the gentleman to so understand it—against a janitor for this office, but I am contending against the proposition of making a distinction between four employees who are carried on the roll under the same title and paid for the same service. As I said, I feel quite sure that the Doorkeeper could detail from these four men a man and give him a week's or a month's service, and then another a week's or a month's service, and so on, and they could do this work without extra expense to the Government and without performing any great amount of labor themselves. It is only for the reason that I think it makes an inequitable distinction between these four janitors that I have stated what I have.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of the same salary being paid four janitors. That is one of the vices of the whole thing. You can not equalize the services of men by paying every man the same price. I know in the cloakroom if the salary was $180, you ought to pay $150 to one man and $30 to the other to put them on an equality. The gentleman from Illinois says that the services have been performed and not paid for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Doorkeeper told me that he has janitors that can do that work. I think the janitors ought to be made to do their duty and clean up the room of the gentleman from Illinois without further expense to the Government. I do not think the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. RUCKER. It looks to me a little embarrassing; the services have not been paid for, and they ought to be paid for.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the report (No. 777) on bill H. R. 12801, by the Judiciary Committee, Sixty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

"JUDGE NOT, THAT YE BE NOT JUDGED."

The SPEAKER. By special order, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have reduced what I have to say to manuscript, and it will take me 25 minutes. I therefore ask unanimous consent for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 25 minutes.

IN VIOLATION OF THE SPIRIT OF THE LAW, THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY, THROUGH THE ORGANIZATION OF STATE CLUBS WHICH MAKE NO REPORTS, IS LEVYING AND COLLECTING ASSESSMENTS OF 5 PER CENT ON THE SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS AND OTHER GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND MAKES NO REPORT TO THE PUBLIC.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, Democrats at the other end of the Capitol appear greatly disturbed because of alleged violations of the corrupt-practices act in the recent senatorial primary election in the State of Michigan.

One unfamiliar with the record of the Democratic Party regarding the violations of election laws and the failure of the party in power to prosecute such violations might easily be misled by these effulgences of Democratic leaders. Naturally would an innocent one assume that these investigators and the party they represent are pure in heart and would be shocked at any political wrongdoing of any kind, or even an intimation of such, much less to be parties to violations of election laws. It is interesting, therefore, to investigate and see if the Democratic Party and its leaders measure up to such a high political and moral standard.

THE LAW SHOULD APPLY EQUALLY TO BOTH PARTIES.

If the corrupt-practices act or the Criminal Code has been violated by any Republican in Michigan or elsewhere those guilty of such violations should be punished. Is it too much, therefore, to ask that if these same laws have been violated by Democrats that they be likewise punished? Was the corrupt-practices act intended only to apply to Republican candidates and the Republican Party, or was it intended to apply with equal force to Democratic candidates and to the Democratic Party?

A DISTINCTION WITHOUT A DIFFERENCE.

In the State of North Carolina a great contest is being waged for a seat in the United States Senate. Senator SIMMONS is a candidate for reelection. Because he located one cantonment in North Carolina, constructed at a cost to the Government of more than $4,400,000, and has secured the location of another camp at Fayetteville, N. C., it is urged that he should be reelected to the Senate. The Greensboro Daily News, an administration paper of great prominence, contains an article by Theodore Tiller, Washington correspondent, with the following headlines: "Senator SIMMONS is given large share of credit for the camp—His talk with Baker probably decided the matter." The article gives credit to the Senator for the location of the new camp at Fayetteville.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order in criticizing a Senator and calling him by name.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STEELE). That is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman was not criticizing a Senator in regard to the business of the Senate.

Mr. DYER. I respectfully dissent from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. POU. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order in calling by name a Senator of the United States and discussing his record and his official record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. If it is immoral for the wife and family of Truman H. Newberry, who have large independent fortunes of their own, to contribute to the nomination of Commander Newberry, of the third naval district, for a seat in the Senate, and to defeat the nomination of Henry Ford, how much more immoral is it for a United States Senator to reach into the Treasury of the United States and grab eight or nine millions of the people's money for the building of cantonments in his own State, and then use that grab, or allow it to be used, as an argument for his reelection?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa is violating the rules of the House by criticizing the record of a United States Senator and calling him by name.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has an absolute right to discuss what a Senator does outside of the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. This is the official conduct of a Senator.

The SPEAKER. Where did he perform his duty?

Mr. POU. In the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken, as far as the Chair could gather it. The Chair was on the floor listening to these speeches supposing it would be a very quiet day. [Laughter.] Here is the rule: "No Member of the House can discuss what a Senator does or says in the Senate." Outside of the Senate a Senator is as fair game as anybody else. [Applause.] If the gentleman criticizes what the Senator said or did in the Senate, it is out of order. If he criticizes what he did in the Secretary of War's office, it is in order.

Mr. RUCKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. If he reached his hand in the United States Treasury to establish a cantonment in North Carolina somebody must have reached his hand into the Treasury to establish one in Iowa or Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that, he does not know. [Laughter.]

VIOLATIONS BY DEMOCRATIC OFFICIALS GO UNPUNISHED.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Democrats in the body at the other end of the Capitol are to investigate violations of the corrupt-practices act in the State of Michigan, I desire to direct their attention, and the attention of the public, to flagrant violations, not only of the provisions of the corrupt-practices act, but also of the Criminal Code by Democratic committees and Democratic officials. While these violations are known to the Department of Justice and to the executive departments wherein these officials who have violated the law are stationed, the Democratic committee that violated the law remains unpunished, and the Democratic officials who likewise violated these solemn provisions of the law not only remain unpunished, but are permitted to continue in the enjoyment of the emoluments of their offices.

A FLAGRANT VIOLATION IN IOWA.

I have here a letter written by the secretary of the Iowa Democratic Club to Miss Clara Behle, of Norway, Iowa, who happens to be the postmistress of that thriving village. This letter reads as follows:

IOWA DEMOCRATIC CLUB,
Shenandoah, Iowa, August 25, 1917.

Miss CLARA BEHLE,
Norway, Iowa.

DEAR MISS BEHLE: I am writing you this letter for the purpose of raising a little necessary money, and, in order to comply with an old-fashioned law, I am sending it under a special-delivery stamp.

These war times are rather hard on us, and we need your absolute cooperation in order to exist. People who owe us excuse the debt by saying that they can't make ends meet on account of the war. They don't get by with this to their grocer, and, inasmuch as the game of politics is one of the largest businesses in the United States, and inasmuch as we are running politics in Iowa on a business basis, they shouldn't try that line of argument on us. But they do, and it keeps us going night and day in order to get the funds to run on.

Besides this, we have a great many other things to look after. We are looking after your interests in Washington. We are gathering information here in our own great State that will be of great value in years to come. Besides this, we are paying the national committee about $13,000 this year. All of this stuff is making us gray headed. You owe us $33 for this year. I am sure you understand this proposition, because our representative, Mr. Plum, explained it to you when he called on you on April 4.

I have not written you sooner in regard to this matter because I wanted to give you all the time possible, and I knew that as soon as we needed the money you would send it in.

I wish you would write to me a little more frequently so that we can keep a little better acquainted.

With kind regards and hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

L. W. DRENNEN, Secretary.

Failing to respond with a check or draft in payment of an assessment made upon her, this same committee within 10 days wrote her a further letter reading as follows:

IOWA DEMOCRATIC CLUB,
Shenandoah, Iowa, September 4, 1917.

Miss CLARA BEHLE,
Norway, Iowa.

DEAR MISS BEHLE: This is to call your attention again to my letter of August 25, which you have failed to answer in any way.

I wish you would let me hear from you right away, because I make out my yearly report on September 15, and I would like to know your attitude toward this matter before that date. I hope you realize the importance of this.

With very kind regards, I remain

Sincerely, yours,

L. W. DRENNEN, Secretary.

THE LAW EVADED KNOWINGLY AND PURPOSELY.

The corrupt-practices act provides that a political committee that contributes to the election of Members of Congress in two or more States must file its report with the Clerk of the House of Representatives. A clever device, indeed, to evade the letter of the publicity law—to organize State Democratic clubs which will contribute to the Democratic National Committee and to the Democratic Congressional Committee, and then these committees in turn assist in the election of Congressmen in every contested district. Who contributes to the funds of the State Democratic clubs no one will ever be able to discover. Where, I ask, has there been any report made of the collections by the Iowa Democratic Club? How will the public ever know who contributed the $13,000 paid into the treasury of the Iowa Democratic Club and by it turned over to the Democratic National Committee?

The Iowa Democratic Club has made no report to the secretary of the State of Iowa. That club has made no report to the Clerk of this House. That club was organized apparently for the sole purpose of evading publicity law. It desired to do something which the State Democratic committee wanted done, which the Democratic congressional committee wanted done, something which the Democratic national committee wanted done. What was it if not to raise money in a manner to avoid publicity? These committees wanted contributions that could not be published to the world. And I want to say to you that this Iowa Democratic Club is a rather formidable organization. It has one director from each congressional district. Many of these directors are men of more than State reputation. I find that W. W. Marsh, treasurer of the Democratic national committee, is on the board of directors from the third congressional district.

In violation of the spirit of the law the Democratic Party, through the organization of State clubs, which make no reports, is levying and collecting assessments of 5 per cent on the salaries of postmasters and other Government officials, and makes no report to the public. How much these clubs are collecting from favorite Government contractors and profiteers the public will never know.

THE IOWA CASE A FLAGRANT VIOLATION OF LAW.

The letter written by the Iowa Democratic Club to this postmistress is not only a violation of the spirit of the corrupt practices act, but it is a flagrant violation of section 119 of Chapter V of the Criminal Code, which prohibits, under a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than three years, or both, the solicitation of campaign funds in any building or room occupied by the Government. Miss Behle was postmistress of Norway, and was in the post office when solicited.

VIOLATORS PROTECTED, NOT PUNISHED.

But the officers of the Iowa Democratic Club, and the officers of Democratic clubs in other States, who are violating the law will not be punished, and these violators of law know it. If their offenses are investigated by Democrats at the other end of the Capitol, the executive departments, including the Department of Justice, will pay no more attention to the report of violations by Democrats than they have heretofore paid to cases where such violations have been expressly brought to their attention.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS ASKED TO CONTRIBUTE.

In this connection, I have a letter written by the financial chairman of the Democratic national committee, addressed to a man in Oregon, interested in profitable Government contracts for building ships. The letter, omitting the name of the man to whom addressed, which I have had to promise to do, is as follows:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE
PERMANENT HEADQUARTERS,
429–441 Woodward Building,
Washington, D. C., August 29, 1918.

_____ _____,
Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: It is incumbent upon every citizen to make an extraordinary effort to uphold the policies of our great President, which can be done only by election to the Senate and House of Representatives those who are 100 per cent American, in accordance with the aims of the administration.

A broad, comprehensive educational campaign is being conducted throughout the country. It is necessarily expensive.

You are now given an opportunity to do something real, and we hope you will make an early contribution, with the knowledge that what you do will help place the national administration in a position to increase its efforts in the prosecution of the war.

Sincerely,

F. A. MCNAMEE,
Financial Chairman.

This letter is not intended for Federal, State, or city officeholders or employees.

Incidentally let me remind the House that while President Wilson is contending that "politics is adjourned," the Iowa Democratic Club says, "The game of politics is one of the largest businesses in the United States," and that it is playing the game. The Democratic national committee, not to be outdone by its Iowa offspring, is sending these gentle reminders to all persons interested in Government contracts.

The postscript added to this letter is, indeed, a weak excuse for sending it to a Government official. Certainly no lawyer of any standing would contend that that postscript attached to a letter written to a postmaster or other Government official, which does not detract from its value as an appeal to the faithful for funds, exempts the writer from liability under the provisions of the Criminal Code.

VIOLATIONS GO UNPUNISHED.

It is unnecessary for the Democrats at the other end of the Capitol to go to Michigan to find violations of the Criminal Code or of the provisions of the corrupt-practices act, so far as campaign contributions are concerned. It is not necessary for them to go outside of the bailiwick of their own party. The attention of the administration has been called to these violations by Democratic Government officials. Have you heard of any of them being sent to jail? This subject is gently dealt with in the report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ending June 30, 1917. I would like to quote at length from this report, but time forbids. I would suggest that this investigating committee send for the members of the Civil Service Commission and ask them to explain their nonpartisan indictment in this respect of officials of the present administration. I read only briefly from page 15 of this report, as follows:

A number of complaints of violations of the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the political assessment of Federal officers and employees were investigated during the year, and as a result an indictment has been secured in one case and three other cases have been referred to the Department of Justice with request that criminal proceedings be instituted. One investigation disclosed what appeared to be a serious violation of the law, the evidence showing that an officer of the Government collected political assessments from a number of subordinate employees by threatening that if they failed to contribute the matter would be reported and they would lose their positions. The evidence was presented to the grand jury, but an indictment was not returned. Recommendations were made for the removal of this official, on which action is still pending. In the case where an indictment was secured, mentioned above, the evidence showed that an official of the United States had solicited and received political contributions from other officers and employees. Recommendation was made for his removal from the service, but no action as yet has been taken.

Several complaints of political discrimination in appointments were investigated by the commission. In many cases it was found that the charges were unfounded, but in a few cases it appeared that, although unknown to the department concerned, political consideration had affected the action taken. The commission recommended the removal of the persons so appointed, but was not successful in having its recommendations carried into effect.

THE HYPOCRISY OF IT.

Just think of a Democratic high official going around among the thousands of employees under him, collecting political assessments, telling such employees that if they failed to contribute to the Democratic Party they would be dismissed from the service, and when the attention of the administration is called to it it not only fails to prosecute such brazen violation, but refuses to discharge the violator of the law when requested so to do by the Civil Service Commission.

I am wondering now if St. Matthew had in mind these pure-minded, nonpartisan Democratic investigators of violations by Republicans when he wrote—

Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

The corrupt-practices act was enacted by a Republican House and a Republican Senate, and was approved by President Taft August 19, 1911.

Yet the Democrats in Congress have in several of their publications claimed credit for the enactment of that law. When the bill was before this body it received the support of the Democratic side and had the warm and enthusiastic indorsement of the late Senator James of Kentucky, who was then a Member of this House. His speech in support of that measure is so eloquent, his sentiment so lofty, that I want to quote briefly from his speech made on the 25th of June, 1910:

If publicity has any virtue in this world it is to give to the voters the names of those that are back of the candidacy and contributing to the election of the respective men asking the suffrage of the people. Publish the names and amounts of those who contribute. Let this be done before the election.

Let the voter with ballot in hand have the opportunity to see the forces that are furnishing the campaign boodle. Let the man who, around a cheerless and humble fireside, almost shivers in the cold see if the Coal Trust is contributing to one of the candidates. [Applause.] Let the ballot holder in his cottage or cabin in which no light scarcely ever burns see if the Oil Trust is furnishing money to one of the parties. [Applause.] Let the ragged man whose family, scantily clad, left at home when he goes in to cast his ballot see if the Wool Trust, the Clothing Trust, or the Shoe Trust are giving their money to help elect a supposed and self-proclaimed friend of the people. Let the hungry man whose family has been denied meat by the greatly increased price know before he determines his choice whether the Meat Trust is financing one of the candidates. [Applause.] * * * Let the bill be a publicity bill in reality, and whether the amount contributed is sufficient to buy a king's ransom or is a widow's mite, publish it to the world. [Applause.] If the money is tainted, do not take it; but if you take it have the courage to say that you took it. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATS STRONG FOR THE LAW, THE FIRST TO VIOLATE IT.

How Democrats roared in their promises then and how they whisper in their performances now! No fair-minded person, keeping in mind your utterances then would suspect that the Democratic Party, which attempted to stand sponsor for this legislation would be the first great political party to violate the law both in letter and in spirit. But such is the case. No fair-minded person would suspect that high Democratic officials would be the first to refuse to prosecute flagrant violations of the law and refuse to remove Democratic officials for such violations, but such is the case if the report of the Civil Service Commission is accepted.

Now, apply the test of James of Kentucky to your plan of raising campaign funds by withholding the names of donors, through the creation of Democratic State clubs, which make no reports. Thirteen thousand dollars is raised by the Iowa Democratic Club and turned over to the Democratic National Committee, and no one but the officers of this club is to know who are the contributors to this club. How much will be raised in like manner by the Democratic Club of New York and similar clubs in every southern State, where millions in profits have been made by Government contractors, and who the contributors to this slush fund are no one is permitted to know. How, under your plan of secrecy, can there be any publicity? How, I ask, under this illegal plan can "the humble voter, with ballot in hand, see the forces that are furnishing the campaign boodle"? How can "the man who around a cheerless fireside, almost shivering in the cold, see if the Coal Trust is contributing to one of the candidates"? James of Kentucky said:

If the money is tainted do not take it, but if you take it publish it to the world.

Now, you are without either conviction or courage.

TIME FOR THE PARTY IN POWER TO CLEAN HOUSE.

This deplorable condition must be corrected. These flagrant violations of the law must cease. While we are fighting for Democracy abroad let us preserve it at home. This can not be done if violations of these election laws continue to exist. Can the party in power expect its adversary to strictly obey a law which it openly violates and refuses to prosecute its own offenders?

The remedy is in your hands. Democratic officials whose sworn duties are to enforce the election laws must cease to be the principal violators. Confine your investigation to the flagrant violations by your own party and stop violating both the letter and the spirit of the law, and by a wholesome example you will force a healthy respect for the law and obedience to it on the part of your adversaries.

Therefore, "Judge not, that ye be not judged." [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAYDEN. To renew my request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD concerning his record in Congress, votes, and so forth. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an additional five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PARTISAN POLITICS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret exceedingly that the Republican leaders have determined to inject partisan politics into the solemn issues of this hour. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The minority leader [Mr. GILLETT] raises the sectional issue and also the partisan issue, and he accuses the Democratic administration of issuing an order to voters in Wisconsin, and here is what he said:

When you issued that advertisement: "To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant: President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for J. E. Davies," etc.

Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin, first mentioned that circular here, and I stated that the Democratic administration was not responsible for it, and Mr. FREAR said that he did not and would not say that the administration was responsible for it, and yet we find the Republican leader here charging that circular floating about in Wisconsin to the great American forces in charge of the war program. This same gentleman, the Republican leader, urges the voters of the country to elect a Republican Congress, because at the end of the war he suggests that the Republicans should have control in order that the great industries of the country may be properly looked after.

And this startling suggestion comes from the standpat gentleman from Massachusetts. He invites us to return to the old days of Mark Hannaism, of Aldrichism, of Penroseism, of Craneism. In the effort to array the North against the South these Republican leaders cry that the South is in the saddle. Well, the patriots of the South have helped the patriots here from the North to relieve the country from the curse of Republican boss rule. If the South is responsible for the great Federal reserve act, the people of America should thank God for CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, for his great service to the country. One of your leaders, Mr. Root, said at that time that the passage of that bill would produce a panic in the United States; but Wall Street, for whom he spoke, could not prevent the passage of that great measure. The 21 men in Wall Street, who were at that time controlling the money supply of the country, with Democrats in control were powerless to defeat that meritorious measure. If you gentlemen had been in control it never would have passed, and the greatest panic that ever cursed the world would now hold us in its deadly grasp. When you were in power 21 men in New York controlled the money supply of 100,000,000 of people. Do these former hungry bosses of the Republican Party think that the intelligent voter would return to those bitter days of privilege and plunder?

I know what you are striving for. You are playing politics behind the screen. You are voting for measures here, some of you, because you are afraid to oppose them. You are trying to get control of the House and the Senate in order that you may shift the burden of the war from the shoulders of the mighty rich to the backs of the masses. That is what you are trying to do. Of course you will not admit it, and those who are furnishing the slush funds back of you will not admit it. What you want to do is to do away with the excess-profits tax. Your leader, Mr. FORDNEY, made a motion to strike out or recommit for the purpose of striking out the excess-profits tax and 186 of you voted for it, and if you had succeeded you would have defeated the Government out of $3,000,000,000 in war tax and compelled us to raise that amount from those now paying their fair share. That is the record of the Republican Party. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] talks about a few cantonments going to the South. Why, gentlemen, we are spending more money in the State of Pennsylvania alone for war purposes than the cost of every cantonment and camp in every Southern State, and yet Republicans get up here and have the gall and the un-American spirit to charge that the South has been singled out for special favors when you know that the North is getting millions and millions of dollars for war purposes where the South is getting only a few thousand dollars.

Now, what is your purpose in all this? Do you think that appeals to sectional prejudice contribute to unity of purpose and the solidarity of the American people? The gentleman from Iowa attacks a Senator, a southern Senator, and complains that a cantonment is being established in his State for political purposes. Now, gentlemen, you know and I know that these cantonments have gone to the South mainly, as I said here Saturday, because of the desirable climate. It is a better place for the boys, your boys and ours, to spend the winter. They can work and train nearly every day in the winter, and because of the climate it costs less money to winter them in the South. But you are trying to make politics out of it. My God, I thought, as the gentleman from Iowa spoke, that if the boys from Iowa, that brave regiment fighting side by side with the dashing, daring regiment from my State—and these boys, comrades in the cause of liberty, love each other like brothers—and if they could have heard his appeals to sectional prejudice here to-day they would say, "We repudiate this man; he does not speak the American language." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, this election will about finish up the old bosses of the Republican Party. I want to make you a prediction now. We will carry this House by 50 or more majority just as certain as you live and God reigns. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are going to trim up the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have seen majorities larger than his cut down by such performances as he has indulged here to-day, and history repeats itself.

Mr. Speaker, there is no sectional feeling now with us in the South. We are a loyal part and parcel of this great country, and gentlemen, these men who appeal to sectional prejudice do not represent the great patriotic heart of the North. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are Americans all. We settled our differences by the arbitrament of the sword, and side by side boys of my State with boys of your State are dying for our liberties on the battle front in France. And I want to say to these men, hungering for the loaves and fishes of office, who would shape their creeds for their cravings and swallow their convictions for a job, these men who would destroy American solidarity in order to control the taxing power of the Republic, that they do not understand the temper and spirit of the patriotic people of America. The American voter is not with you in this miserable game. He will repudiate you in November. You have deliberately tried to inject into this campaign a sectional issue.

You have elected a man chairman of your congressional committee who injected it into the presidential campaign of 1916. Are you working for American solidarity, unity of purpose, and concerted action, or are you putting partisan success above the welfare of your country? Do you ever have a kind word for the South, a great section of the American Union? No. You are trying to create a feeling of prejudice in the North against the South. That is what you are doing, and you are doing it for a political purpose. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is what you are doing. You can not deceive anybody about that. Some of you, here and elsewhere, are trying to belittle the President's Cabinet, and you are trying to belittle the President. You stand here and speak for hours, and not one of you has ever attacked the Kaiser—not one of you. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But you find time to criticize and embarrass the President, who carries the country's flag against the Kaiser. You try to discredit him, but you never lay your hands on the Kaiser, because you have got some Potsdammers in your district that you do not want to offend. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the truth, and I regret to have to speak it so plainly.

But the Bible tells us that the truth is the light, and "by their fruits ye shall know them." And you now have the gall to boast that you have supported the administration. Why, nearly all your party voted against the first three revenue measures passed. One hundred and five of you voted against tabling the McLemore resolution. Seventy-six of you voted for the Cooper amendment; 160 of you voted against the Shipping Board bill. And then you have the gall to stand here and criticize us and the Democratic administration about not speeding up things, and you are standing in the way of every progressive step. And the Kaiser was smiling at you then. And now you say, "We are supporting the administration and you are not." But your record tells a different tale.

Ninety-seven of you voted against the espionage act. We wanted to put the men in jail who were filling their dirty sheets with slanderous and seditious attacks upon the Government and the boys in uniform, and 97 of you voted to shield them. That is the record of your vote. One hundred and forty of you voted against the first revenue bill—nearly all of your party—just a handfull voted with the administration. Suppose you had been in power then? Why, that revenue bill would never have passed. What sort of a bill would we have? Why, we would have a consumption tax revenue law, and then the man in overalls would have paid as much tax as Rockefeller. Under our plan Rockefeller now pays $38,000,000, and under your plan to strike out the excess profits tax Rockefeller would not have paid more than $3,000,000.

The old bosses of your party now trying to come back are the agents of special interests. You can not get away from that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] One hundred and ninety-two—listen to this—voted against the second war-revenue bill. One hundred and ninety-two! Nearly all of you. Poor, old boss-ridden Republican Party! Statesmanship has about died out of Republican leadership in this body. There are a few good Americans over there, but they are slaying them in the treadmill of the moneyed candidates of the Republican Party. Foss, of Illinois, the only great American in the race for the Senate, is a poor man, but Mark Hanna's son-in-law, who spent $105,000 for billboard advertising in the home State of Lincoln, wins out with flying colors, and Foss lies prostrate on the field.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. For a question.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask if the Kaiser was smiling when a certain Senator was leading the fight against the armed-ship resolution, and your leader here was leading the fight against the declaration of war?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator who did that has been defeated by his patriotic Democratic constituency.

And what have you done with BRITTEN and MASON? You have indorsed them, and one of them introduced a resolution to exempt boys of German and Austrian blood from service to that flag on a foreign field, and he now bears the indorsement and commission of your party to come back. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And Mr. MASON, "BILLY MASON," the nuxated-iron gentleman of Illinois, has returned with an indorsement and commission from the Republicans from the State at large, from the State of Lincoln. God of our fathers, think of that! In the one-hundredth year of her statehood, Illinois stands with bowed head. Thompson sweeps Chicago, BRITTEN is renominated, and MASON comes in with flying colors, bearing a commission from the State at large. The American people owe it to Illinois to call upon her to do something to redeem herself this year. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I believe the patriots of Illinois, the rank and file of the party of Lincoln, will repudiate those mistakes at the polls. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. MASON introduced a resolution here to stop the boys at the ocean side and leave the President without an army. You could not take them over unless each one would say, "I will consent to go." Then where is Mr. BRITTEN with his exemption for the boys of German and Austrian descent? Both exempt from service if they desired it. The Commander in Chief could not take them over with other American boys unless they should choose to go. I give these nuts to my friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] to chew upon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield; my time is short. If you will secure for me another 30 minutes, I will yield to you as often as you like.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. Speaker. Mr. McCormick, the son-in-law of Mark Hanna, spends $105,000 for billboard advertisements. Think of that, gentlemen! Have we reached the time when these great moneybags can put up seats in the Senate for sale and traffic to the highest bidder? Foss, where is he, this big American, destroyed by the power of the purse? He is the only man on that side, as I now recall, who has thoroughly and powerfully arraigned the Kaiser and his brutal autocracy, and you have defeated him and renominated MASON and BRITTEN, who have opposed and embarrassed the administration. Do you believe that the American people are going to turn over this Government to such leadership? Newberry, of Michigan, spent $178,000 just for advertisements. Think of that. Two men from Wall Street contributed $25,000 each. Why? Why, they wanted to get in control of the taxing power of the Republic. That is what they want. They want to shift this tax burden from the back of the man most able to bear it to the back of the man least able to bear it. That has always been the desire and purpose of the bosses of the Republican Party.

Yet you say you are supporting the administration. One of your men in another body, without cause or excuse, said that the President did not intend to turn back the railroads or the telegraph lines or the telephone lines; that he was going to hold all those, and that when the soldier returned he would not find an occupation. Can you say he was supporting the administration? No. Whether he knew it or not, he was giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama must not comment on Senators. That is against the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought the Chair held that you could just speak in a general way about them?

The SPEAKER. No. You can not speak in a general way or in a particular way about anything that happens in the Senate.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I heard the gentleman from Alabama make a statement about a man in another body. He did not say "the Senate."

The SPEAKER. But everybody knows what is meant. You can not beat the devil around the stump in any such fashion. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. It has been done here for many years.

The SPEAKER. It does not matter whether it was done for a hundred years. It makes no difference.

Mr. HEFLIN. Since some think that I meant Senator SHERMAN, of Illinois, I will say no more about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman to order and ask that his words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. What words?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The words he just uttered.

The SPEAKER. What are the words?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. "Some gentlemen think I refer to Senator SHERMAN, so that I shall say nothing about it."

Mr. HEFLIN. I could ask that his words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota insist on the words being taken down?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want the gentleman to strike the words out of his speech.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not strike them out; you may have the House strike them out if you can, but I do not propose to shield any Republican in his attacks upon those in charge of the war program.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota is one of the men who, when I was getting after certain gentlemen for suspicious conduct, persisted in interrupting me, when I was exposing their doings and defending the flag. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will never undertake to disturb the gentleman when he is defending the flag by his acts, but when he is defending it with words I do want to heckle him a little.

Mr. HEFLIN. I offered my services to the Commander in Chief; did the gentleman from Minnesota offer his?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I gave mine. The gentleman's services must have been of no value, because the Commander in Chief did not utilize them. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Did he utilize yours? The Commander in Chief said that he needed me here more than in the ranks as a soldier. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield any more to the gentleman from Minnesota. He said that I was worth more here to combat the doctrines of the gentleman and those like him.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman's services must have been absolutely valueless——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota must not interrupt the gentleman who has the floor unless he has his consent.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg the Speaker's pardon, but the gentleman was out of order in referring to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has his remedy. If the gentleman from Alabama exceeds the rule, he can have the words taken down.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He has exceeded the rule every time he has got on his feet.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not raise that in the midst of the speech of the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Milwaukee should make the point of no quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make the point of no quorum, but I wish to say that the question of a quorum is always in order. I hope the gentleman from Oregon will withdraw his point of order and allow the gentleman from Alabama to proceed.

Mr. McARTHUR. I will withdraw the point, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make a remark himself. The gentleman from Alabama had the floor for 25 minutes. The gentleman from Oregon popped up and made the point of order; he had no recognition from the Chair, and it is the business of the Chair to try to keep order in the House and to keep it from being converted into a vaudeville performance.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am making the situation rather warm for some gentlemen on that side because they are just now beginning to see and appreciate how the people at home are going to look at their performance here. Do you think you can win an election in the United States now on a sectional issue when boys from all over the country are fighting side by side for our liberty? If you can, then there is no hope for a great national spirit of real Americanism. God bless the memory of the lamented McKinley. He came to Atlanta during the Peace Jubilee in 1899, and holding up an old Confederate flag said, "I want you to have the flags that we took from you during the war. We do not want to hold them; you are loyal members of the great American family, and I love you all." [Applause.]

I saw Confederate soldiers standing there with tears running down their faces, and they said "God bless President McKinley." [Applause.] But I see in this morning of the twentieth century, when our very existence is at stake, when our boys from every section are fighting and dying, some of you descend to the un-American plane of sectional prejudice for an issue at a time like this. [Applause.]

God forgive you, for you know not what you do. Is it that you are so hungry for the loaves and fishes? Is it that you yearn so for the taxing power? Is it that you put power above patriotism and your success at the polls above the welfare of your country? Do you think you can deceive the people into thinking that Wilson would not know how to run the country after the war is over? God Almighty have pity on you. Why, he took the country when you had literally ruined it, when 21 men controlled the money supply and 100 trust magnates controlled the labor of the country and intimidated it at the polls, and the two together could demoralize the whole business of the United States. Wilson cleaned house and put the American household in order, and by doing it he enabled our financial institutions to survive the shock and storm of a world war. No panic can be produced here now. The world war could not produce it; and Wilson enacted a law that enabled the country to do that, and do you think now that you can make the people believe that he is not able to handle the affairs of the country when the war is over?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not now. My good friend from Chicago is one who has voted pretty well sometimes, and I know he does not indorse some of these fellows up there that I have been talking about.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this war is over, when the war is finally ended, the nations of the earth will look to one man, and to one man above all others, to lead in the readjustment and reconstruction of the world, and that man will be Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. [Applause.]

Let me say this, in conclusion, the country is going to give him a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate. Roosevelt asked for a Republican House and Senate for McKinley during the War with Spain, and so did ex-President Harrison. Lincoln asked for it in his day, and the people gave it to McKinley and Lincoln. Wilson is asking for it now, and he is going to receive it in the November election; and I pray God that no man will come back to either body who talks any other than 100 per cent Americanism. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 227 (H. Rep. 809).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 152, entitled "A bill to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States"; that there shall be not exceeding two hours of general debate, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto for final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, before I move the previous question I would like to see if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will agree on limitation of debate on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I should be very glad to limit debate on the rule, say, to 10 minutes, 5 on a side.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time limit for debate on the rule be fixed at 10 minutes, 5 minutes of that time to be controlled by myself and 5 by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time limit for debate on the rule be 10 minutes, 5 to be controlled by himself and 5 by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that a mere statement of the situation regarding this measure will be enough to convince the House that the adoption of this rule is a matter of justice and square dealing. The Nolan minimum-wage bill was introduced in the Sixty-third Congress and considered. It was introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress and given a hearing, which required 423 pages in the printed report. These hearings went into the necessity of establishing a minimum wage, and the bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Labor and was put on the calendar, but never came up for consideration on the floor of the House. On the first day of the Sixty-fifth Congress, the present Congress, April 2, 1917, it was introduced. On the agreement that the House entered into that only war measures should be considered the committee took no action during the extra session, but at the first opportunity during the regular session it held hearings on this measure and reported it unanimously on the 14th day of January, 1918, after exhaustive hearings were held. On the regular Calendar Wednesday it was called up by the chairman of the Committee on Labor [Mr. MAHER], and then a point of order was made against the measure on the ground that a previous unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] precluded any consideration of it because the House had decided not to take up any measure which was not on the calendar before December 12, 1917, until a certain bill—H. R. 269—should be considered. It was a very complicated point of order, but the Speaker properly decided, I think, that it applied to this measure. The Committee on Labor lost its day in court, the first and only occasion of that kind in this Congress. So from that day to this, some eight months time, the Labor Committee has not had an opportunity for the consideration of a single measure.

Now, the adoption of this rule will remedy that injustice, correct that wrong, and I am sure that everyone in the House will admit that the Committee on Labor should at least have its just right to consider this measure.

Now, as to the merits of the legislation itself, let me say just a word. There has been no general revision of the compensation scale for Government employees since 1854. Add to that the further fact that the dollar has been cut in two in purchasing power in the last five years and you have abundant justification for this measure. After all, the sole test of the dollar is what it will buy, and, judged by that standard, the compensation of these Government workers has been greatly reduced in these recent years. If $60 was a proper compensation five years ago, even the $90 provided by this bill will not be an increase in real wages.

This measure seeks to provide a basis, a minimum wage. I am convinced that there is a limit below which you can not go and still permit an American to live as an American should live. I am convinced that there are many instances in the Government service to-day where the compensation paid faithful workers is below that limit. Such a condition is intolerable and demands instant remedy.

The very first consideration of justice is that the least among us all shall have sufficient payment for his daily toil to provide food, clothing, shelter, and some recreation and education for his children. Every investigation made by private organizations and by governmental agencies proves that an annual income of less than $1,080 will not provide these fundamentals of American living. Indeed, in many cases the limit has been placed much higher, so that the figure set in this bill is in no way an exaggerated one.

In many industrial centers to-day the minimum wage for common labor is $4 and $5 a day. Even the Government is bringing new and untried workers to Washington at $1,100 and $1,200 a year. But in the meantime the faithful workers of years' service are required to attempt to make ends meet on a much smaller sum. It is not just, it is not fair, and I am sure this House will act justly in this attempt to correct such injustices.

Finally, these employees depend absolutely upon this Congress for action. They can not strike nor use the other methods open to the employees of private concerns. They have no other hope than in the justice of legislators, and they have placed their case before this body and patiently awaited action during the last trying years. I am convinced that this measure will be passed by an overwhelming majority, and its passage will be an act of real justice. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a fair rule for the consideration of this bill. If any change whatever should be made in the rule it should be cutting down the time for general debate, so that bill could be read under the five-minute rule and considered for passage at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield in that particular, the bill only consists of two paragraphs, and under the general rules of the House in the Committee of the Whole House there might be only five minutes' debate to each paragraph. I think there should be some opportunity given for discussion of this important measure, which will involve a considerable charge on the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Two hours is a good deal of time for considering the bill in general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a very liberal provision, I will say to the gentleman, considering the general debate that is usually permitted under the rules presented by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The bill provides a minimum wage of $3 a day. The wonder is that a family can live where the head gets but that amount of money, especially in a city like this, or any other large city in the country. I can understand how in a small place, where a man has his own home and garden and pays no rent, he could get on with a lesser wage. I sincerely hope this bill will pass and that there will be maintained throughout the country a high standard of wages, so that the high standards of living may be maintained. The pride of this country and its power to-day are due to the fact that for years it has maintained a higher wage scale than any country in the world and therefore the highest standards of living. Its men everywhere are equal to every test to which they are put. The American, wherever he is tested along with other men, does honor to his country and reflects credit upon the manner in which he has lived. I hope the rest of the world will soon bring up their standard of wages and living to our standard, so that the whole world in the future will have a higher plane of living maintained by higher scales of wages. I have never been an advocate of low wages or of low prices for the product of wages. The only way in which an economic system or of a social status of high order can be maintained is upon a high scale of wages and good prices for the products of labor; that will maintain a high plane of living.

I sincerely hope that this resolution will be agreed to and that the bill will have the consideration of the House and become a law at an early hour.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The rule was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 152, with Mr. POU in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 152, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That after the beginning of the first fiscal year following the passage of this act the minimum compensation of any person employed by the United States or by the government of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $3 per day; or if employed by the hour, not less than 37½ cents per hour; or if employed by the month, not less than $90 per month; or if employed by the year, not less than $1,080 per annum: Provided, That persons employed on a monthly or annual salary basis and who regularly perform less than a full day's service shall receive compensation at the rate of not less than 37½ cents per hour: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to persons enlisted in the military branches of the Government nor to persons receiving quarters and subsistence in addition to their compensation, nor to the employees in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the Territory of Hawaii, the Territory of Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who have been continuously in the employ of the Government of the United States or in the employ of the government of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than two years, and who shall have attained the age of 20 years.

SEC. 2. That upon the passage of this act the heads of departments in which are employed persons as defined in section 1 of this bill shall issue new appointments at the increased rate of compensation herein provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] or the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] control the hour in opposition, so that he may distribute the time to those in opposition to the bill, if there are any in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. A gentleman opposing the bill would be entitled to control an hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that these gentlemen, representing the minority of the Committee on Labor, either one of them, control the hour.

Mr. NOLAN. If time is allotted to me no one would have it in favor of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is a member of the committee, and it is his bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California have an hour's time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am not opposed to the bill, but it seems to me that if there is anybody opposed to the bill they ought to have control of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California, as the Chair understood it, has announced that he would yield part of the time to gentlemen.

Mr. NOLAN. I would yield all the time, and would not use any of it to those in opposition to the bill, if I had charge of the opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] control one hour of the time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill was originally drawn by a small organization of Federal employees in the city of San Francisco in 1913. This organization represented the men in the Customs Service, Internal-Revenue Service, and all branches of the Federal service, particularly those that were in the custodian force. The men that are receiving the lowest wages paid by the Government of the United States are the men who are working throughout this country in the large cities in every branch of the Government service. This bill has been indorsed by each successive convention of the American Federation of Labor since 1913. It has received the indorsement and commendation of practically every organization in this country that has been interested in the question of a living wage. At this point I insert a few of the indorsements recently received from various organizations:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The thirty-eighth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at St. Paul, Minn., June 10–20, 1918, declared that Congress should take favorable action on the Nolan bill (H. R. 152) for establishing a minimum wage for Government employees.

Pursuant to the action of the convention we are bringing the subject to your attention with the request that you give your active support to securing the passage of the bill. The bill was reported favorably by the Labor Committee on January 18, 1918, and the Committee on Rules is expected to report a special rule making its consideration possible immediately after the passage of the pending revenue bill. A similar bill was unanimously reported favorably by the Labor Committee of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

While the cost of living is constantly mounting and wages are everywhere advancing for persons in private employ, it is regrettably the fact that the United States Government is paying thousands of its employees less than a fair living wage.

At the beginning of this year more than 60,000 Government employees were receiving less than $3 per day, the pay for some thousands of the grades having been fixed over 60 years ago (Rept. 239, 65th Cong., 2d sess.; hearings on H. R. 11876, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), with scarcely any increase since that time, excepting the percentage increases in the appropriation bills for 1918 and 1919. Yet the cost of living has advanced nearly 100 per cent in the past five years. For thousands of these employees the maintenance of a reasonable, wholesome standard of living is impossible on the wages the Government allows them.

Unskilled labor is now nearly everywhere receiving at least $3 per day, and in many cases a higher wage. Industries throughout the country are constantly advancing wages to enable their employees to meet the increasing cost of living, but these thousands of Government employees have thus far been neglected and given less than is justly due them.

It is not possible that Congress, or any Congressman, intends that the Government shall take an unfair advantage of any of its employees and pay them not only less than prevailing rates of wages but less than a fair living wage.

Trusting that H. R. 152 will receive your active support looking to its early enactment into law, I am,

Yours, very truly,
FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY-TREASURER,
Washington, D. C., September 20, 1918.

Hon. J. I. NOLAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of the National Federation of Postal Employees, I am writing to urge your support of H. R. 152 (the Johnson-Nolan bill), which seeks to establish a minimum wage of $3 a day for all civilian employees of the United States. This bill has twice been recommended to the House for passage by the Labor Committee; it has been indorsed by many organizations of wage earners; and its principle—the establishment of a wage scale that insures better living conditions for thousands of underpaid employees—has the indorsement of the people of the United States.

This minimum-wage bill is expected to come up for consideration when the pending revenue measure has been passed, and I earnestly solicit your active support of it.

Very truly, yours,

[SEAL.] THOS. F. FLAHERTY,
Secretary Treasurer.

NATIONAL WOMEN'S TRADE UNION LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., September 23, 1918.

MY DEAR SIR: The National Women's Trade Union League, in behalf of thousands of women workers, asks your support for the Nolan minimum-wage bill for employees of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia (H. R. 152), which is expected to come before the House of Representatives for consideration Tuesday or Wednesday of this week.

While readjustment of the wage scale in the Government service is needed for men and women alike, we urge upon your attention the fact that the greater number of low-paid Government workers, and consequently the greater proportion of those affected by this bill, are women. Most of these women, moreover, have dependents.

In the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where 4,000 women are employed on skilled and semiskilled work, the basic wage of 1,800 of them falls as low as $2.37 per day, and for about 1,800 more it is $2.56 per day and less. The war bonus of $120 per year added to this gives these workers a maximum of only $2.88 per day.

In the Library of Congress and the Public Library of the District of Columbia hundreds of women with technical training in library science are receiving no more than $2.88 per day and some receive but $1.83 per day.

Hundreds of teachers in the District of Columbia are paid less than $2.88 per day.

Charwomen and janitresses in the various Government departments receive as little as $26 per month, and rarely more than $55 per month for full-time service.

We submit that such rates as these are not a living wage, much less a fair compensation for the work performed, and we ask you to compare them with the rates fixed by the National War Labor Board and every other wage-adjustment board in the United States to-day. The Government, through all its administrative agencies, is applying to private industry the principles of an adequate living wage and equal pay for equal work by women and men. The Federal workers whose pay is fixed by Congress are the numerous and striking exception to the general application of these principles.

We ask Congress, therefore, to relieve the existing condition of injustice and hardship by passing the Nolan minimum-wage bill at once.

Sincerely, yours,

AGNES NESTOR,
Chairman National Legislative Committee.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES,
Washington, D. C., September 21, 1918.

DEAR SIR: On Tuesday, September 24, it is expected that the House of Representatives will have before it for consideration the Nolan bill (H. R. 152) providing a compensation of not less than $3 a day—37½ cents an hour, $90 a month, $1,080 a year—for employees of the Federal Government and of the District of Columbia.

The Nolan bill would give immediate relief to the poorest paid Government employees, those whose need is imperative in the face of the greatly increased cost of living. The simple justice of the wage provided by the Nolan bill as a minimum is indicated by the following figures:

Cost of maintaining a family, average for 24 American cities (for Washington, D. C., add 6 per cent)	$1,650
Cost of bare existence for a stockyard's family (figures supplied by Chicago Bureau of Applied Economics)	1,178
Yearly budget, United Charities of Chicago, for destitute family in stockyards district	1,107

It is sometimes claimed that the lower salaries are paid to employees without dependents. Of the employees listed in the latest available census reports as receiving $900 or less, over 60 per cent were married. Of the 4,000 women employed in one bureau alone—Engraving and Printing—70 per cent have dependents.

At the last annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in St. Paul, Minn., in June, 1918, a resolution was adopted without a dissenting vote advocating the immediate passage of the Nolan bill.

The National War Labor Board, acting under the authority of the President, is requiring private employers throughout the United States to pay their employees an amount at least sufficient to maintain the worker and his family in health and reasonable comfort. This amount has usually been fixed at more than $3 a day for unskilled labor.

The Nolan bill provides a very modest minimum wage for Government employees. We urge you to give it your fullest support.

Very truly, yours,

LUTHER C. STEWARD, President.

In 1916 the two great parties were asked to include the provisions of this bill in their platform. The American Federation of Labor and other representatives went to Chicago and to St. Louis, and the Democratic platform of 1916 carries a provision for a living wage, which was based upon the bill that is now before the House for consideration and indorsed by the American Federation of Labor. Instead of indorsing the bill or indorsing a minimum-wage bill, the Democratic platform carried an indorsement for living wage, which was based upon this measure.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] told you of the efforts to have this bill considered early in the present Congress. Due to the fact that lack of unanimous consent prevented its consideration, its friends have been very patient from time to time, stepping aside for every other measure, particularly war legislation. The only war character to this bill and the only people that have got to battle are the people that will be benefited, and they have got the battle of life to win with the small compensation received from the Government of the United States.

Now, in the Sixty-fourth Congress extensive hearings were held on this bill, so much so that the hearings embraced 420 pages. The testimony is not of people who are interested in this thing for any philanthropic purpose but the testimony of Government employees from different sections of this country.

They told their story, the story as it affected them in their everyday life; the story of their homes, and their efforts to try to make both ends meet on the small compensation that the Government was allowing them. At this point I insert some excerpts from the testimony and an analysis of the hearings published in the Washington Times, Sunday, April 16, 1916, in an article by Theodore H. Tiller, entitled "Tragedy of underpaid United States workers":

THE REAL TRAGEDY OF THE $2-A-DAY MAN.

Much has been written in a general way about the under pay of Government employees. Even in the higher grades the compensation is not commensurate with the service. The real tragedy of serving one's Government, however, lies in the stories of the men and women who receive $2 a day and less.

Why do they not resign and seek other employment? the ultrapractical one probably will ask. That same question arose during the hearings. It was answered, and there was shown the psychology of a situation that shapes the ambitionless careers of thousands of Government employees to-day.

"We haven't the nerve to give up one job and go after another," admitted one witness.

"Jobs are hard to get; if we lose a day's time it counts with the man who skimps to make ends meet."

"I am too old; they won't have me," wrote another, in recording that for a score of years he has worked for $2 a day—no more, no less—and is in a run that leads inevitably to an unnoticed death "in Government harness."

"I have been expecting I would get a raise year after year," explains another, and thereby makes known the gradual transformation of the optimist into the pessimist.

DISHEARTENED BY EXPERIENCES OF THOSE ABOUT HIM.

The truth is the average Government employee, becoming disheartened by the experience of those about him, hesitates to tackle something new, to let go the small sure thing that he has to reach out for the elusive bigger opportunity.

Many of the men and women in the Government departments to-day are the products of the small town. The House committee was informed that they come to Washington with a false idea of the advantages and possibilities of the Government service. Their conceptions of the cost of living is built on the pattern of small-town life.

As a rule debt overtakes them sooner or later here; some marry when the salary is not large enough for two. Nearly all lack the determination to go back and explain that working for Uncle Sam isn't what it is represented to be. They live in hope that something will turn up, but it seldom does.

One of the witnesses before the labor subcommittee told of the chief clerk of one of the departments who testified several years ago about superannuated employees in his department.

When he was asked by a congressional committee if there were inefficient clerks who should be discharged, the chief clerk said:

"I had rather sever my connection with the Government than discharge any of these old employees. Never again will I do it. Once I had to discharge three old clerks. One of them committed suicide, another died of a broken heart, and the third is in the poorhouse awaiting death."

MESSENGER'S STORY TYPICAL OF THEM ALL.

A story typical of those related during the hearings on the Nolan bill was that of Harry Goldman, an assistant messenger in the War Department. For years he has drawn $2 a day. He is the father of the little girl who knows now that there isn't any Santa Claus.

Goldman appeared to be a clean-cut, intelligent fellow. He talked without affectation: there was the ring of sincerity in his simple statement. His was not a "grand-stand effort." The pathos of his narrative caused members of the subcommittee to look rather helplessly at one another. A trace of moisture could be seen in the eyes of some in the committee room.

Once upon a time Goldman was in the Navy. He proudly received an honorable discharge and believed it would aid him in getting a position anywhere. At the first private establishment to which he applied he was called a "Navy bum" and told to move on. Yet he said he had never tasted intoxicants and had no mark against his Navy record.

Finally he drifted into the messenger service at $2 per day. He pays $15 a month for a flat near Twenty-fourth and F Streets. His only white neighbors, he said, are those occupying "the part of the house downstairs."

NEAR EXHAUSTION FROM STUDY AND WORRY.

Goldman is of a nervous type. He went to night school until study and worry brought on nervous exhaustion. Then the doctor said "move to the country."

"But we can't go to the country," he said. "I can't manage it. All the time we plan for something and say we will do it next week—but the time never comes.

"I will tell you a little incident, not to influence you, but just that you may know about the worries.

"We have a little girl 6 years old. All along until last Christmas she believed in Santa Claus, it's a nice thing for children to believe in Santa Claus. Well, she had been worrying us a long time to get her a tricycle, and from year to year we thought we could do it, but we never could. Last year we thought we could make it when she asked us to have Santa Claus bring her one. But we found out again that we couldn't, and the only thing to do was to tell her so. I was unable to get it because of the extra expense of doctor's bills.

"We simply couldn't do it. It was a case of telling her there wasn't any such thing as Santa Claus. So we told her—we let her know that there wasn't any Santa Claus, and now she knows."

There was an embarrassing pause and silence in the committee room. Goldman continued:

"Of course, I realize that this has nothing to do with this bill, but I just wanted to show you how much denial there must be when a man has to live and support a family on $60 a month."

Mr. and Mrs. Goldman have four in the family now. Another baby came a few months ago. The baby's skin, he said, had never known the touch of talcum powder.

CLOTHES MADE OVER FROM THOSE OF MOTHER.

"Our little girl," he continued, "has never had any new clothes; all her clothes have been made over from things my wife has worn. My wife makes one hat out of another hat; I don't know how she does it, but she does.

"Our doctor's bills have been high, but the doctors here are considerate if you pay them a dollar along. Prescriptions, though, are cash, and they cost from 65 cents up now.

"The women are all thinking about this bill. My wife has asked me many times if it will go through.

"She woke me up the other night at midnight saying, 'Harry, I can't sleep.'

"'Count sheep,' I said.

"'I can not sleep for wondering whether the Nolan bill will go through,' she said. I told her I hoped it would, but I couldn't tell. Then we lay there and talked about the bill and finally she went to sleep."

Goldman told the committee that not infrequently he turns off the heat in his house, even in coldest winter, to save coal bills.

"But summer will soon be here, and we won't need any heat," he said, with a smile of optimism that all had to admire.

That is just one of the many domestic tragedies that soon will be printed in a document of the Congress that appropriates for the salaries of the employees of the greatest Republic on earth.

GIVEN 25-CENT RAISE IN 10 YEARS' SERVICE.

Charles Williams, night fireman at the White House, started in more than 10 years ago, while Theodore Roosevelt was President, at $1.50 a day. Within 10 years he has received a raise of 25 cents a day. His was a matter-of-fact statement:

"I have got five boilers to look after. I have got the kitchen range to look after. I have got the coal to wheel in on my shift, which would be the 4 o'clock shift, but when the man comes on the 12 o'clock shift he can not wheel the coal because it makes too much noise.

"On the 4 o'clock shift a man has got to get in all the wood and coal into the kitchen for the use of the family that night, and even the fireplace work. All they pay is $1.75 a day.

"I have no Sundays off. I have no holidays off. During the summer months I have to work eight straight hours through, and if I lose an hour or two, or a day, I am docked for it. Really, I work about six days' overtime for the Government and do not get a cent. I work seven days a week and frequently overtime, and I get nothing for the overtime.

"Sometimes I can pick up some jobs on the outside—such as pipe covering.

"My wife kept a boarding house and broke her health and now is losing her eyesight, and that is a great deal of expense. I have buried two children.

"I am under the Department of Public Buildings and Grounds. I have asked them for a raise, but I am told that they had no money. That is all the excuse I get. I have to have some technical knowledge to look after those White House boilers. There are two steam boilers and three hot-water boilers."

John M. Mohl, classified as a laborer at the National Museum, but assigned to do electrical work, presented to the committee a letter he wrote to the Washington Times suggesting that "if Secretary of State, William J. Bryan, can not live on $12,000 a year, how can it be expected that a Government employee with a family can live on less than $75 a month at the present rate of prices of the necessities of life?"

RECEIVES ONLY $55 AFTER 18 YEARS.

Mr. Mohl said he received only $55 a month, although he had been at the Museum for 18 years, and had constantly sought promotion through hard work and appeal. A daughter, he said, had been forced to go to work in a department store in order to help the family along.

"I am not much fit for anything except a watchman," said Joseph W. King, of the Interior Department, who gets $720 a year.

"The Public Printer said he couldn't have men in the service who didn't pay their bills. You are supposed to pay even if you don't have the money to pay——

"There is no incentive for a man living like me to bring children into the world. We have a boy, and my wife and I love children, but she says it will be a blessing if we do not have more. At the present time there is no future for my boy; I have kept him out of school purposely, because it requires clothes and things like that, and I have put it off for a year or two. He is 6 now. We know married couples that will not have children. They can not afford to when the man makes only $2 a day.

"There are many men in the Government service who would like to come here, but they find it humiliating. It is humiliating to me. It isn't pleasant for a man to come here and say he is working for so little that he has to accept charity and to show the clothes he has received through charity."

Miss Florence Etheride, temporary treasurer of the Federal Employes' Union, submitted to the committee a letter she received from a $720 employee at the Naval Observatory. His name will not be printed because of the sacrifices he has made, which he enumerated as follows:

"I have lost my savings; I have lost my home; I have lost my wife; I have next to lost my children, and I have almost lost courage to continue the struggle."

He told how he had started to purchase a home with the savings accumulated while in the Army. Failing to meet his payments, the house was taken from him. He continues:

"As the cost of living increased year by year our financial difficulties increased in proportion, in spite of strictest economy. We had to discontinue attendance upon church because we could not contribute to the minister's salary. Our children stayed away from Sunday school because we did not have the pennies they wanted to give. Many a time they stayed away from public school because their shoes had worn out.

"The constant strain of the struggle finally became too much for my wife. She became dissatisfied and left home and children for a time. She returned home to try again, but found it too hard. Conditions were no different.

"She finally could not resist temptation, so we are living apart. I had to put the children in an orphanage. Every time I visit them they cry and ask me to take them home. Poor little things, they do not know their home is gone."

A watchman wrote that he had walked to and from work for 10 years in all kinds of weather because the nickels counted with a man who gets only $2 a day.

LETTER FROM $900 MAN WHO HAS HIS TROUBLES.

Another letter came from a $900 clerk, who said that clerks of this grade, as well as the $660 and $720 grade employees, have their sorrows. This clerk has an invalid mother. Both, he says, have been used to better things, but have gradually gone down the hill "to the class kown as 'submerged,' because of financial stringencies."

"My case simply shows the picture of a Government clerk fitted by education and former associations for refined surroundings, yet living, practically, in a hovel in a negro neighborhood, struggling for a bare existence, physically tired all the time, and no chance for rest or recreation," he says.

Twenty-five years ago, said Mr. King, he was in the Government service at $1,400 a year. He left it for a while, and when he came back the best he could get was a $720 job. Harking back a quarter of a century, he said:

"When I was here then I could buy things for half and less of what I pay now. I could buy 3 pounds of round steak or 3 pounds of pork chops for 25 cents; beef liver was 5 cents a pound, and a soup bone, big enough to make soup for a hotel, was 10 cents. A house that you could rent them for $15 costs you $25 or $30 now. We pay $27.50 for a house where there is a little bit of a front yard—not big enough to amount to anything—and a back yard not big enough to whip a dog in."

Another Government Printing Office employee, a skilled laborer at $626 a year, said:

HUSBAND, WIFE, AND BOY LIVE IN ONE ROOM.

"I have a wife and a boy. The three of us live in one room with a little side room, a box affair, where we cook and store things. It costs us $17 a month; my food costs me $23 to $25 a month, and so on. I owe doctors' bills. I owe a grocery bill of $50 to one man, but when he saw the conditions under which I was struggling he just let it go.

"We haven't been to a theater in seven years. We have been to moving-picture shows twice in five years. My boy doesn't get a penny for anything; neither does my wife. I have accepted a good many things from various sources—from people who know of my condition. The clothes I have on were given to me.

"My boy was sick last winter with the whooping cough. The ladies in the office had to donate the money for medicine. I owed a grocery bill last winter. The bill was sent in to the Public Printer because I could only pay a dollar a week on it.

"I am mentally dazed and bewildered through the multitude of conflicting duties and requirements of the threefold responsibility of office work, housekeeper, and sick nurse—all through insufficient funds."

A humorous touch to an otherwise tragic story was given when Thomas F. O'Connor, laborer at the Pension Bureau, related the difficulties of rearing a family of eight children on $55 a month.

"Yes; they are all living," he said. "I asked the chief clerk of the Interior Department some time ago if he could do anything for me, and he said it was my own fault that I had so many. Well, I knew that. He did not have to tell me that."

DOESN'T SEE ANY SIGNS OF HELP COMING.

"Well, T. R. agreed with you on the big family," commented Chairman Maher, of the subcommittee.

"Yes; but I don't see any signs of help coming," said Mr. O'Connor.

"Talking about clothes," he added, "I have not had a suit of clothes that I bought myself since 1902. Except for somebody helping me out I haven't had a suit in more than 12 years. I saw the piece in the papers about the gravedigger. Talking about the gravedigger, I have him skinned all to pieces I think—10 in a family and $55 a month.

"The oldest one is 18 years. There is one working now. There are six going to school. Of course $55 doesn't go far, and people in the office get me work outside."

FINEST CEMETERY, BUT PAY THERE IS LOWEST.

"This is said to be the finest cemetery in the world," said the petition, "but it has the lowest pay. Our per diem men get $1.50 and the monthly men from $40 to $60 (the $60 being for the overseer).

"The superintendent receives $100."

This petition recalled the appearance before the committee of Arthur Holliday, a gravedigger, who came in his muddy clothes and shoes to tell the committee how he tries to get along on $40 a month. He pays $8 a month house rent, and his wife takes in sewing, "while a rich lady in Washington helps us out sometimes." Holliday was a big, powerful fellow, but he confessed he had had little education and is tied down to his job of digging clay in the cemetery where a Nation's heroes are buried.

"This is not the time to change places," he said, discussing "another job." He wisely added:

"If you let one job get away from you, you may not get another. That is why I have been holding on and asking for a raise, but they keep putting me off. How can a man live on $40 a month?"

"I can not answer that," frankly said Chairman MAYER, of the subcommittee.

There was just a line or two from a widow classed as an "unskilled laborer" in the Department of Agriculture. She wrote that her husband died of consumption. He left three sickly children. She is trying to support them on $30 a month. Her "salary" once was $40 a month, but she was reduced last July.

WANTED TO KNOW IF HE WAS SINNER OR MARTYR.

An uncle wrote asking:

"Is my nephew a sinner or a martyr?"

A number of years ago, he said, his nephew came to Washington and obtained a $2-a-day job. Children came, and the family began to run into debt. The "loan sharks" fastened upon the husband and father and harassed him more and more as he went more deeply into their clutches. Even a raise in salary did not extricate him. He took to drink, deserted his family and became a wanderer on the streets, a "bum" in the parlance of those who travel the highways. Now he thinks he can come back, but his uncle says:

"He is the logical victim of a system of compensation handed out by the United States Government."

Pleading that the committee will not make public her name, "because my husband might lose his job," which pays $40 a month, a wife wrote, among other things:

"We have meat on Sunday. We have fire only in the kitchen stove. When my boy asks me why I will not heat up the bedroom I have to tell him we haven't any coal. We never get a street car ride. My little boy has one suit, which he wears to school and everywhere else.

TRYING TO FEED FAMILY OF EIGHT ON $70.

"If you consider us a part of the Government, why not give us the opportunity to be a respectable part?" asked J. M. Black, who wrote that he is endeavoring to provide for a family of eight on $70 a month.

A messenger in the War Department, recently stationed with the troops on the Mexican border, writes from Douglas, Ariz.:

"I have been for 15 years a messenger at $60 a month. After going through the mill of writing your life history for the examination papers, after waiting for years for an appointment, after swearing allegiance to the United States Government on a half-dozen formidable documents, and after being then placed on probation for six months, it is certainly a brilliant achievement to "land" a messenger job paying the princely salary of $60 per month. A brainless Mexican peon can make more than that here on the border around a smelter or mine."

Fourteen watchmen in the Treasury Department compiled a statement of their average living expenses, eliminating clothes, amusements, household furnishings, and doctors' bills, estimated from actual experience that it requires an average of $52.50 per month for family to exist. Some of these watchmen have served, it was stated, at $720 a year for more than 20 years. They get 30 days annual leave, but only 10 days sick leave, and no holiday allowances.

Another communication was signed by 19 employees of the Marine Hospital Service at Baltimore. Their salaries range from $300 to $720 per annum, with only one man receiving the higher figure.

Outdoor workmen under the office of the Public Buildings and Grounds, in this city, revealed that they are paid $1.60 per day, but they lose "rainy days." Clear weather means low pay; rainy spells mean reduced wages or none at all.

Thirty-eight park watchmen under the same office get $840 a year. They are quasi policemen, but they have no police fund. Joseph E. Showhan, who filed the petition, shows that many of these park employees are supporting large families.

Still farther down the wage scale was J. A. Collins, laborer, in the Library of Congress, one of the most magnificent and costly buildings in the world. He struggles along on $450 a year and says: "Sometimes we suffer for the necessities of life."

"I can not let go of this $720 job because I am too old to get work elsewhere," is the brief but touching statement of a Department of Interior employee.

Miss Lula V. Harris, chairman of the committee representing the examiners of the numbering division, Bureau of Printing and Engraving, called attention to the fact that these examiners, doing a highly important work, receive $700 a year.

Sixty men in the rag-laundry division of the bureau receive $1.84 a day and are sometimes furloughed without pay, according to a petition filed with the House committee.

"I want to marry, but I haven't the courage to get married on $60 a month," wrote another employee of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. "Many of us come from small towns, and until we get to Washington we don't know how little you can do on what the Government pays."

Louise C. Neavitt, writing in behalf of the girls in the Government Printing Office, who receive $1.75 a day, but who are given a "promotion" of 10 cents per day after seven years' service, says:

"I know a widow supporting herself and three children on $1.75 a day. She gets up at 5 in the morning and goes to bed about 11 at night. She isn't a grouchy mother, either. If she can smile on this wage, what would she do were she to receive $3 a day?"

From the workmen at the Animal Industry Farm at Beltsville, Md., came a plea for the Nolan bill. They receive $40 a month.

George L. Cain, president of the National League of Government Employees, who lives at Lynn, Mass., testified in favor of the bill, declaring that:

"In the State penitentiary at Stillwater, Minn., there are convicts who are able to make monthly as much or more than some Government employees are earning. More than $80,000 was paid out to convicts in that penitentiary last year."

NO CHRISTMAS GIFTS FROM UNCLE SAM.

"But there are no Yuletide gifts to the employees of the United States," he said, "neither do they have a pension system."

Officials of a number of associations formed by classified service employees were before the committee. Thomas F. Flaherty, secretary-treasurer of the National Federation of Postal Clerks, said that the glowing circulars about the civil service sent out by some correspondence schools are responsible for the influx to Washington of many men and women who think there is a career in the Government service.

The customhouse guards at the port of New York receive $840; the Woman Binders' Union of the Government Printing Office (the binders receive $2.20 a day); the unskilled laborers of the Internal-Revenue Bureau, who get $660 a year; laborers and custodians of the Baltimore customhouse, receiving from $300 to $720 a year; and many other underpaid employees, drawn from every branch of the great Government establishment, were represented before the committee.

No story told was of hope and contentment. Want, discouragement, disillusionment, heartaches, the fight against odds constituted the keynotes of this congressional hearing on the parsimony of a great Government and the penalties inflicted by such a policy on thousands of helpless and apparently forsaken employees.

Now, a great many of these salaries have never been reclassified or revised since 1854. Most of the custodian force, which comprises the watchmen, the firemen, the elevator men, and other employees in the Government service throughout the country that take care of the public buildings, have had no revision of their salaries since 1854. The only advance that has been made and the only advance that could be made without a general bill of this kind has been made with the annual increase of $120 a year. That is the only consideration these men have ever got since 1854. That applies to thousands here in the city, in the District of Columbia, and a great many more in every part of the United States.

There has been consideration given to those that are taken care of under lump sums in the District appropriation bill and other bills here in the District. A few years ago we were paying $1.50 and $1.75 to common labor employed by the District Commissioners. Now they receive from the District Commissioners a minimum of $3.25 a day, plus the $120 a year increase, or $10 a month, which makes their minimum pay $3.65 per day here in the District. It is impossible to get the kind of labor you need for this sort of work unless you pay this money. They need to live. The struggle is terrific, and it is up to Congress now to do something permanent.

Now, some people question the wisdom of legislating for a minimum rate of pay. Each and every one of the executive departments engaged in mechanical work or in contracting for war work has come to the conclusion that it is better to have a set minimum and hew close to that line than to have half a dozen methods of payment and have a number of departments bidding against one another, which creates a continual labor turnover at a great cost to the Government. In lieu of that they have established a minimum rate and recommend that it be made general throughout the country, so that the Shipping Board and the War Department and the Navy Department and other departments will not be competing against one another for men, thereby increasing the cost to the Government and having this continual labor turnover, which means nothing but loss of production and greater financial outlay. The Government itself is working out the policy now of a universal wage rate for all of its employees in the mechanical establishments and all of the employees of those they contract with. The War Labor Policy Board, representing all the departments, is now engaged on that work. So is the wage-adjustment board of the Shipping Board. So is the Railroad Wage Commission.

The President recently held up a revision of the wages in the shipyards by the Wage Adjustment Board on the theory that it was a poor policy for the Government of the United States to pay one wage to a machinist and a boiler maker in the shipyard and a different wage to the machinist and boiler maker on the railroads or in other war industries. He has called all of the representatives of these different wage-adjustment boards in the various executive departments together for one specific purpose, and that is to fix a minimum wage in all of our Government activities that these various wage boards have to do with. You can call it a minimum wage or a maximum wage, but it is a standard wage to be applied to all industry in this country, and so far as possible it is the expectation that those engaged in other industries outside of the essentials will follow in line and adopt it, so that there will not be any turn over of labor in this country, due to war conditions or thereafter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am interested in the gentleman's statement. Did I understand him correctly as to the board of department officials who were seeking to revise the schedule of pay of those in the departments when I understood that those are in the mechanical departments of the Government?

Mr. NOLAN. I am referring to these boards connected with the arsenals and the navy yards.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman said—maybe I did not catch him correctly—that there was a board in existence to revise the pay of all the department employees.

Mr. NOLAN. No. The wage adjustment award is automatically put into effect in the Navy Department and in the arsenals, because the character of work in the shipyards is similar to that in the navy yards and arsenals.

Mr. STAFFORD. No one who is acquainted with the conditions prevailing in the departments here and in the Government service generally fails to recognize the need, the pressing need, of some revision of salaries, because those salaries have been in existence on the present scale for years and years.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is this intended to cover the railroad employees also?

Mr. NOLAN. No; that is not my understanding. This bill, of course, was drawn before we took over the railroads.

Mr. STEVENSON. This covers all persons employed by the United States or the government of the District of Columbia?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. While the United States is operating the railroads, this bill without excluding language would cover them.

Mr. NOLAN. It would apply generally. I think the employees on the railroads render a very important service.

Mr. STEVENSON. But there are very many subsidiary employees about the stations who are employed on very minor duties, where it would be a tremendous hardship to the railroads to require them to pay $90 a month for that service.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. So far as railroad employees are concerned, they would be excepted under this law by the provision which requires that they should be two years in the employ of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a moot question whether the railroad employees are employees of the Government. That is a rather close question. The Committee on Appropriations excepted from the $120 horizontal raise the railroad employees because it was believed they were outside the realm of strictly Government employees.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question, for information strictly?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. In the present conduct of the Post Office appropriation bill they reclassified all the postal employees, making the compensation of the first class $1,000 a year. As I understood it, that met absolutely all the demands of the postal employees, and the only thing they further ask is that we make that a permanent reclassification. As I understand your bill, those of class 1 will be automatically advanced to $1,080?

Mr. NOLAN. As I understand it, those in the Postal Service referred to are those in the first year.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no. That is first-class substitutes. They may serve a part of a year or a part of a month, while as substitutes they would not serve the whole year. The first year of the appointment they will be in class 1.

Mr. NOLAN. They must be in the service two years.

Mr. BLACK. They are in the Government employ as substitutes——

Mr. NOLAN. It says they must be continuously employed.

Mr. BLACK. Probably that would exclude the first class.

Mr. NOLAN. And they must have reached the age of 20 years. I think they would have to be, under the provisions of this bill, two years in the Postal Service.

Mr. BLACK. What I was anxious to avoid was a new classification for postal employees, and there would have to be unless the two-year proposition would exclude them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What was the reason for putting in the limitation that they must be employees who have been in the service two years?

Mr. NOLAN. That was a committee amendment put in in the Sixty-fourth Congress. There are a great many messengers who go into the Government service at the age of 14 to 16 years. The idea was, generally speaking, that this bill should apply to those who go into the permanent civil service at 18, and they ought to be in the service two years before being entitled to the higher compensation; that during the two years they should be employed at the entrance salary and not paid the higher rate, and so that limitation was put in.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I want a little information. I am not familiar with the methods of employment of those who do janitor service in and about the public buildings. Since I have been occupying an office in the House Office Building I have been observing those who perform such service. I have ascertained that they received the enormous wage of 25 cents an hour, beginning in the morning at 6 o'clock, and are required to pay their street car fare to and from their homes. I am interested to know whether this bill would provide an increase of salary for them?

Mr. NOLAN. The minimum is 37½ cents for one hour of work for those who perform less than the regular day's service.

Mr. ROSE. I was interested in knowing whether they come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; the charwomen do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I notice in the report one of the chief considerations is to provide a wage sufficient to enable parents to bring up their children in a decent and healthful condition of mind and body. With that in view, may I ask if the bill makes any discriminatory wage to people—to single persons or to married persons?

Mr. NOLAN. It does not. I will say that that is a question which, to my knowledge, has at various times been raised. Nobody has successfully worked out a method where it could be applied equitably and justly, due to the fact that you are exacting the same sort of service from single and married men, or from men with or without dependents and from women with or without dependents. The idea is if you can not give each and every individual who performs the same service the same consideration, as far as conditions and wages are concerned, it is liable to disturb rather than benefit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Could not you work out some such plan as the allotment to the soldiers of this war—a certain wage and so much additional for each child and the wife?

Mr. NOLAN. It might be worked out on that basis, I will say to my friend from Virginia, but we thought if we established a minimum it would be sufficient. Take the soldiers, for instance. We start out on the theory of $30 a month for the private and 20 per cent additional for foreign service. Then they take the family and work out the allotments. We worked it out at $90 a month, or $3 a day, believing that that is as little as any individual could get along with, and certainly not any too much for a man with a family.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The result of the gentleman's answer, then, is that it is impracticable to work out a uniform scheme making a just discrimination.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; as far as I know no business, industrial or commercial institution in this country has ever tried it successfully, and I am sure if they could work it out advantageously it would have grown instead of diminished.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Another question. In reading the report the chief consideration for the wage is the great increase in the cost of living due to the abnormal conditions under which we are now living?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. This was worked out before the war and conditions have become more abnormal since that time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would it not be wise to consider whether or not we should in an abnormal period fix a rate of wages for a normal period. Would it not be better to confine it to the existance of the war and then say when the war is over——

Mr. NOLAN. The bill was introduced in 1913, prior to the war, when the cost of living was going up gradually, and it has become abnormal since that time. Let me refer to the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina in his presentation of the revenue bill before the House and leave it to the judgment of the House as to when we are going to get back to normal conditions. As I understood the gentleman from North Carolina, his prophecy was that even after the war is over, even after demobilization takes place, the expenditures of this Government would be somewhere near three or four billion dollars annually as compared with a billion before we entered the war.

Now, I do not profess to be a student of economics, especially the higher economics, and I just want to comment upon a certain statement which he made. He predicted this country would see 50-cent corn, 70-cent wheat, and 10-cent cotton, practically putting us down where we were in the nineties in this country. Now, I leave it to your judgment how are we going to raise three or four million dollars after this war is over on 50-cent corn, 70-cent wheat, and 10-cent cotton? I spoke to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] a while ago, instead of looking at the report, and found out that five and one-half billion dollars out of this $8,000,000,000 revenue bill is being raised from excess-profits and income taxes. It leaves two and one-half billion dollars to be raised from internal-revenue taxes and every other method of taxation the committee could think of. Now, prior to our entrance into the war our annual receipts from income taxes were something like $80,000,000 a year, which means we have got to carry on these excess-profits taxes and income taxes or some other form of taxation or else we can not get enough money to run this Government. You can not do it on 50-cent corn, or 70-cent wheat or 10-cent cotton.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The price of cotton is fixed abroad.

Mr. NOLAN. Cotton is a staple and the price is a world price. All prices of staples are world prices. You have to have revenue——

Mr. MONTAGUE. If we spend all we receive, where are we to reduce taxation?

Mr. NOLAN. You have got to have high prices to produce your revenue.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Just a suggestion on this line. If we increase the civil pay roll of all officers, how does it make high prices for the products sold in this country?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not say the increased pay rolls do it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Salary or wage?

Mr. NOLAN. I say you have got to have high prices to get great revenues.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can we legislate high prices?

Mr. NOLAN. No. Take, for instance, your revenue bill. You start here and say you have to have so much money, and you fix the expenses of the Government, so much money for bonds, interest, and redemption, or else we will have to repudiate our bonded indebtedness, and we are not going to do that as a Nation. Now, to get that we have to levy taxes; you have got to levy taxes on industry, on commodities; you have got to levy taxes on incomes and excess profits, and for the Government to tax these profits and incomes business and industry must get high prices, which means high living costs. We are never going to go back, with three or four billion dollars fixed expenditures in this country, to 50-cent corn or 70-cent wheat or 10-cent cotton, and I hope the time will never come when we go back to those prices, because nobody can live on the farm and produce things at that price. So I say you are going to have, compared with prewar conditions in this country, abnormal conditions with regard to prices, and when prices are high wages must be high accordingly, and the prosperity of the country demand you give the people consideration. We should be in industry fair to the workers as regards hours, wages, and working conditions, and the Government of the United States should be the first to set the example for the private employer to follow. To bear out the statement regarding abnormal prices that these underpaid employees here and elsewhere are called upon to meet, I insert a table compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor:

AUGUST 29, 1918.

The Department of Labor authorizes the following:

Below is shown what the same food that cost $1 in July, 1918, cost one month ago, one year ago, and five years ago in Washington, Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and San Francisco:

	July, 1918.	June, 1918.	July, 1917.	July, 1913.
Washington	$1.00	$0.98	$0.92	$0.54
Baltimore	1.00	.98	.83	.54
Philadelphia	1.00	.97	.83	.57
New York	1.00	.98	.86	.59
Chicago	1.00	.97	.90	.59
San Francisco	1.00	.98	.82	.63

The next table shows what food that cost $1 in July, 1913, cost in July, 1918:

	July, 1913.	July, 1918.
Washington	$1.00	$1.85
Baltimore	1.00	1.84
Philadelphia	1.00	1.77
New York	1.00	1.68
Chicago	1.00	1.69
San Francisco	1.00	1.58

Summarizing the figures, the purchasing power of $1 in July, 1918, as compared with July, 1913, five years previous, had shrunk to 54 cents in Washington and Baltimore, 57 cents in Philadelphia, 59 cents in New York and Chicago, and 63 cents in San Francisco.

Stating this in another way, the increase in the cost of food during the five-year period was 85 per cent in Washington, 84 per cent in Baltimore, 77 per cent in Philadelphia, 68 per cent in New York, 69 per cent in Chicago, and 58 per cent in San Francisco.

In the one-year period from July, 1917, to July, 1918, food advanced 22 per cent in San Francisco, 21 per cent in Washington and Philadelphia, 20 per cent in Baltimore, 17 per cent in New York, and 11 per cent in Chicago.

I just want to call attention to this. There must be some justification for legislation of this kind and there ought to be some well-founded principles in asking for it. Now, the tendency of the time is to fix a living wage, and in fixing that they generally fix a minimum wage.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. BLACK. There is a provision in your bill that says it shall apply to those who work by the month or year and they should put in a full day's work. Now, I want to know what a full day's work is; how many hours?

Mr. NOLAN. A full day's work in the District of Columbia, generally speaking, is understood to be seven hours. Throughout the country it is an eight-hour day. Now, most of the custodian force and those in public buildings work are on a 30-days basis with two weeks off a year. They do not get Sundays or holidays off and their pay is fixed by the month.

Mr. BLACK. Now, charwomen, for instance, who have charge of a building, are they rated as monthly or annual employees?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; if they work four hours a day they get $1.50 for the four hours.

Mr. BLACK. Are they paid now by the hour?

Mr. NOLAN. Some are paid by the month; a short while ago some received as low as $240 per annum.

Mr. BLACK. If they are paid by the month they would not get this $3, or $1,080 per annum.

Mr. NOLAN. No; not under the terms of this bill.

Mr. BLACK. I want to know why they do not get the $1,080.

Mr. NOLAN. If they perform a full day's service, they do.

Mr. BLACK. That is what I had in mind, and I propose to offer an amendment when we get to it that defines what a full day is, which is eight hours.

Mr. NOLAN. Of course, in the District here we have had quite a controversy over that, and the President vetoed a bill which carried an eight-hour provision—not less than eight hours a day—but the general order of employees here work seven hours a day. I think in the mechanical departments they work eight hours.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think we ought to include any employees who work less than seven hours, we will say, to get this $1,080?

Mr. NOLAN. No; a person employed monthly or on an annual-salary basis, who is required to perform less than a full day's service, shall receive compensation at the rate of not less than 37½ cents an hour.

Mr. BLACK. I would really like to see this definite and clear.

Mr. NOLAN. I am not a lawyer, but the lawyers on the committee feel that covers the case thoroughly. We went over that, as we wanted it to be clear on that particular point, so there would not be any opportunity for contention, and they get the benefit of the 37½ cents an hour if they perform less than a full day's service.

Mr. BLACK. But if they work here by the month they do not give any amount of time and, whether they work one or two hours, they get $480 if I am correct.

Mr. NOLAN. I can not tell you just exactly the system in vogue here for keeping time, but I presume there is some system. In the House Office Building, when the charwomen come over there, they come at a certain time in the morning and they finish at a certain time before we arrive. And in the evening it is the same; they have a head charwoman, who keeps tab on them. And it would be a very poor system if they did not have some check on them.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman explain fully, so that our people out in the country will understand it, why seven hours constitutes a full day's labor in the District of Columbia and eight hours elsewhere? I am not saying this in the way of criticism, but, as a matter of explanation to about 100,000,000 people, I think that distinction ought to be made clear.

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to my friend from Nebraska that I was opposed to the so-called Borland rider, and I thought we discussed that for hours and days here. It was eventually passed and sent to the President, and was vetoed, the reason being given that a change of conditions was not thought desirable; that these people had been brought into the service during the last 20 years, with the understanding, advertised by the Civil Service Commission, that seven hours constituted a day's labor in the District of Columbia, and if they changed the conditions now it was a violation on the part of the Federal Government of its contract. He elaborated on that, and more so than I could, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. More than you could, or probably would.

Mr. NOLAN. I am trying to get now what you might call——

Mr. SLOAN. Trying to establish by authority what you would not affirm on your own responsibility.

Mr. NOLAN. I am trying to establish by law something that will benefit the under dog.

Mr. SLOAN. One would be a little more "under" than the other in this case; those outside of the District a little more "under."

Mr. NOLAN. That can be corrected, and it has been attempted to correct it by legislation, which failed. I am now trying to establish a living wage, a minimum wage.

Mr. SLOAN. Do you think that a seven-hour basis in the District of Columbia is proper while it is eight hours a day in your glorious State of California?

Mr. NOLAN. Well, I will say to the gentleman, that is a long story, and I would like to have time to discuss it, and I can not discuss it in connection with this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I notice the exception is that the provisions of this bill shall apply only to those persons who have been in the employ of the Government of the United States or in the employ of the Government of the District of Columbia for the period of the past two years. I think "the past two years" ought to be stricken out and also "who shall have attained the age of 20 years."

Now, there is another provision here that it shall not apply to postmasters. Well, there are about 40,000 fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. NOLAN. I will take the last one. The statement was made to our committee that a great many of the fourth-class postmasters have some little business in connection with their postmastership, and that the postmastership does not take all of their time. Now, we figured, as the gentleman from Texas here stated, that the question of postmasters is entirely a matter that ought to be taken care of elsewhere. Inasmuch as there was a classification bill here before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that committee would give these postmasters consideration.

Mr. CANNON. To which I agree. But you say "postmasters." Now, the fourth-class postmasters, I think, have the power to appoint deputies in the service of the United States, and a deputy would be entitled to more pay than a fourth-class postmaster.

Mr. NOLAN. If he put in the full hours' service in the Postal Service he probably would get 37½ cents an hour for each hour he worked.

Mr. CANNON. And there is the power in 40,000 postmasters, each one of them, to have a deputy, and some of them two.

Mr. NOLAN. I think the administration would see that postal revenues were not used for this purpose.

Mr. CANNON. If you make it to apply to postmasters it ought to apply to deputy postmasters. Do you not think so?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that fourth-class postmasters have no deputies and have no power to appoint them.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If he has not, then the law has been changed.

Mr. MADDEN. Third-class postmasters have, but fourth-class postmasters have not.

Mr. CANNON. If a fourth-class postmaster is sick for a month there is an official there, and he is a deputy, and made such by the postmaster.

Mr. NOLAN. The reason the two-year limitation was put in by the committee was because of the fact that a good many of the employees are below the age of 18 years—messengers and the like of that—and they felt that inasmuch as this was permanent law it was intended to benefit those who had been in the employ of the United States for at least two years.

Mr. CANNON. Do the House employees and the Senate employees come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. NOLAN. If they are employees of the United States, I think they would.

Mr. CANNON. In one sense they are employees of the United States. They are employees of Congress. They are not in the civil service.

Mr. NOLAN. It says any person employed by the United States or by the Government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I think it does not apply to the employees of the House and Senate.

Mr. NOLAN. I would not be able to give my friend a legal opinion on that. I do not know how that has been generally applied. I know they applied the $120 a year annual increase to the House employees.

Now, on the question of a minimum wage, there have been many decisions of the War Labor Board, who are conducting hearings regarding industry throughout this country, wherein they fix the wages, under a general proposition, at 45 cents an hour, or $3.60 for an eight-hour day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that all of the time under the control of the gentleman was used by him.

Mr. NOLAN. I did not want to take all the hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have been using 15 minutes of the gentleman's time.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to take 15 minutes of the hour that has not been used on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for 15 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NOLAN. Let me develop this minimum proposition first.

Mr. HASTINGS. I just wanted to ask this question: About how many employees would this bill affect? In other words, how many regular employees of the Government of the United States are there who now receive less than $3 a day? I did not have time to look over the report carefully. I glanced over it hurriedly, and I do not find it.

Mr. NOLAN. It is in the recapitulation of the total estimates. That is on page 15 of the report. After the bill was reported and I was commissioned to make the report, in May, 1916, I got from each and every executive department and independent establishment of the Government—and the originals are on the table here—a statement of the number of employees benefited and the cost. You will find that it shows that at that time, in 1916, there were 66,000 employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia that would benefit by this bill, and so far as we can possibly estimate—although the War Department at that time stated that their figures were high rather than low, because we have since then excluded the Philippines and insular possessions—it would amount to somewhere from twenty-two to twenty-four millions, all told, the first year. Since then you have given to all of these employees $120 a year increase, which amounts to over $7,000,000. My information is that there are few employees coming into the Government service now who receive less than $3 a day.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then there would not be a great increase?

Mr. NOLAN. It is figured that between fifteen and sixteen million dollars would be the cost of this bill the first year.

Now, I want to call your attention to the annual report of the United States Steel Corporation for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1917. On page 26 of that report, under the subheading of "Employees and pay roll," it tells the average number of employees in the service of all companies in 1917, in comparison with 1916. The total number of employees in 1916 was 252,668. The total number of employees in 1917 was 268,058. The total salaries and wages paid in 1916 was $263,385,502; in 1917 it was $347,370,400. The average salary or wage per employee per day of employees, exclusive of general administration and selling force—and I call your attention to that; that is the reason I am quoting these figures—the average of all salaries exclusive of general administration and selling force, which are the highest salaried employees of the Steel Trust, in 1916 was $3.29, and for 1917 the average of those employees was $4.10.

Now, they give the average of the total force, including the administrative force, as $3.36 for 1916 and $4.16 for 1917.

You might say that that is no indication of what they are paying for the minimum wage, but their present minimum wage, or the minimum wage in the early part of this year, may be gathered from a newspaper article concerning wages paid by the United States Steel Corporation, which employs some 200,000. This article says that they pay their day laborers $3.80 per day, compared to $2 per day paid in 1915. That is almost double what common labor received in 1915. Since this article was published they have advanced wages by 20 per cent, and the pay is now something over $4 a day.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. This is proposed to be permanent law?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. And it will hold good after the war is over, when wages will decrease very materially?

Mr. NOLAN. Was the gentleman here when I made my statement about that?

Mr. NORTON. No.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the other day, in discussing the revenue bill, when he presented it to the House, stated he figured that the annual expenditures of this Government after the war would be something like $4,000,000,000, and that our excess-profits taxes and income-tax sections are expected to yield $5,500,000,000. He said we would then get back to 70-cent wheat and 50-cent corn, and lower prices for other commodities, and I stated that I would like to know how any student of economics would get $4,000,000,000 from such prices as those. People have got to have money to purchase the staples of life, at least, and those staples are going to be high, because manufactured articles will be high, and the reflex from staple articles and manufactured articles goes right down the line into everything that goes into the cost of living. So that I do not think we will ever get back in this country to the time when we are going to get down to low wages. Even the farmers will have to pay considerably above what they paid for prewar labor, and almost as much as they pay now, if we are going to raise this sort of revenue.

Mr. NORTON. I trust that after the war those who are engaged in productive occupations will receive more than they ever received before.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to this: Has he taken into consideration the fact that this permanent law will affect all Government employees, and contract work on river and harbor improvements, where labor employed by private concerns is not receiving as high a minimum wage as this?

Mr. NOLAN. I will state to the gentleman that I do not know of any instance in any section of this country where for some years past you could go and get a man for much less than $3 a day. To give an illustration, here is what is going on in the District of Columbia. I have marked a few items in last night's Washington Times. The Washington Railway & Electric Co. wants men, beginning at 43 cents an hour for the first three months, 46 cents an hour for the next nine months, and 48 cents per hour thereafter, making an eight-hour day about $4. The same rate of pay for the employees of the Capital Traction Co., and they can not get men. They have let down the bars in every direction, employing men as old as 50 years. Going over here you find a driver offered $18 a week for a horse and wagon. Another place, labor for warehouse work $4.18, apply at the American Railway & Express Co. Labor on a theater building, 40 cents per hour. Here is another, $19 a week, time and a half for Sundays and holidays—Corby Co. Here is one instance where they want colored dishwashers, $60 a month; good treatment; no Sunday work.

If we are going to have—and I am satisfied we are—high prices, this is not based on abnormal conditions. It will be a fair rate, a living wage for Government employees after the war.

I want to call the attention of the House that after the war is over we are going to give a preferential status, as we should, to the soldiers fighting our battles in France, and their dependents; and if I had my way I would let down the bars of the civil service and give the men absolute preference. I want to see the man that has lost an arm or a leg and is a cripple get these watchmen's positions, messengers, and such positions as they can fill, and see that they get a living wage.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. That is a worthy sentiment on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. NOLAN. I know that the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. NORTON. Entirely. But is the gentleman in favor of paying relatively more to Government employees than is paid to men who are doing private work in private occupations for the same kind of work?

Mr. NOLAN. Under the competitive system wages are largely determined according to circumstances. Whether we like it or not, the law of supply and demand works in abnormal and normal times, whether abnormally good or abnormally bad. Whether organization takes place or not it is bound to have an influence. I do not want to see the Government of the United States go below the standard, and I think the rate they ought to stand up to is the rate in this bill, and give every man a chance to make a living and a fair chance to bring up his family in a decent and a healthful manner. If this will have an effect on the private employer to pay a living wage it will be of great benefit.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman would not want $2 paid in private life and compel those people who can not get more than $2 a day to help pay the taxes to pay the employees $3 a day.

Mr. NOLAN. I want to see these men which you say can not make any more—I say a man is worthy of his hire, and I hope the time will never come when a contractor will attempt to pay less than the social conditions require to give a man and a woman a proper chance to educate their families and take care of them honestly and decently. If that is so, we will have a better citizenship, and that is the principle that underlies this minimum-wage bill.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. In speaking of preference that should be made in behalf of the soldiers when they return, I was struck with the allusion to the military branch of the Government here, in which you provide that this act shall not apply to the military service.

Mr. NOLAN. The idea was not to conflict with the regular pay that is provided for the Military Establishment, because it would raise automatically the pay of the enlisted man in the service.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman does not say that. It says that the provisions of "this act shall not apply to persons enlisted in the military branches of the Government, nor to persons receiving quarters and subsistence in addition to their compensation." You make two classes, first the military branch and then you discriminate by making another class those receiving quarters and subsistence.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; this is for those who receive pay and receive no subsistence, clothing, or quarters. I submitted the bill to the War Department and made certain exceptions as to the Philippine Islands, and it was those who receive nothing else from the Government but the monthly or day pay. That is the only reason for discriminatory classes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think it is right for the Government to come in here and except the service of the military branch of the Government at this time, and then write a law that is discriminatory against them upon the advice and approval of anybody?

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman mistakes the purpose of this bill.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am not talking about the purpose, I am talking about the result of it. Here are men getting $30 or $40 a month working in this branch of the Government, and at the same time other men under similar conditions get $90 a month.

Mr. NOLAN. It is understood, at least a year or two ago, from those conversant with the facts, the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, that the cost—subsistence, quarters, rations, clothes, and so forth—was about $1,200.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But the gentleman has not applied it in here to those who get that, because he makes two classes of people: First, those who are enlisted in the military branch of the Government only—that makes another class—and persons receiving quarters and subsistence.

Mr. NOLAN. Exactly the point I wanted to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman take a few minutes to answer a question?

Mr. NOLAN. I will take five more minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know whether the gentleman has covered this question, because I was not in the room all the time, but I would like to know how broad the term is, "any person employed in the Government." Will it include, for instance, railroad service, telegraph and telephone service, including telegraph girls and messenger boys?

Mr. NOLAN. Who have reached the age of 20 and been employed by the Government two years after they are employees of the Government of the United States. I am not a lawyer and I could not give a legal opinion on it. When this bill was written we had not taken over the railroad or the telephone service of the country, and of course that was not the idea; but if they are in the employ of the Government and have been employed by the Government for two years——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it is a safe guess that the railroads and telegraphs and telephones will be under the control of the United States for two years after the war.

Mr. NOLAN. If they are employees and are in our service two years—that is, continuously—and have reached the age of 20 years, then they would receive the benefits of this bill.

I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A moment ago the gentleman made the statement about the wages paid by the United States Steel Corporation. I want to call attention to the fact that the Steel Corporation has a subsidiary in my district which employs perhaps 20,000 men in that district, and they are paying their coal miners less than $4 a day, and their common labor, of course, is much below that.

Mr. NOLAN. I said $3.80. I do not know as to coal miners.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Who are working by the day. Of course, the miners who work upon the tonnage basis, some get more and some get less, according to what they do, but those who are working on the day basis get as low as—I do not remember the figure, but I think it was $3.84 per day, and the scale ran down from that to something about $2.50 a day. I do not call attention to this for the purpose of refuting any arguments the gentleman makes, but to expose that method that the Steel Corporation is guilty of at this time.

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I wanted to ask the gentleman why he provides here that the provisions of this shall not apply to certain persons. You do not make it apply to rural carriers, but you make it apply to those holding appointments as postmasters.

Mr. NOLAN. It excepts postmasters.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. But does not except rural carriers. There are certain rural carriers in the country who operate a triweekly route. What do you do with those? They get about $600 now.

Mr. NOLAN. Persons employed on a monthly or annual salary basis who regularly perform less than a full day's service shall receive a compensation at a rate of not less than 37½ cents an hour.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Did the gentleman's committee consider that in reference to rural carriers?

Mr. NOLAN. We considered that if a man is employed at less than a full day or a full month he is put into the hourly rate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be advisable, in view of the fact that the Post Office Committee has taken such good care of its employees and the further fact pointed out by the gentleman from Mississippi that there are rural carriers employed at least six days in a week on routes only 8, 9, or 10 miles where the service only requires a few hours, which under this law might be considered a full day's work and would receive the full amount, that postal employees should be excepted from this bill?

Mr. NOLAN. I thought possibly under that proviso they would be paid at the 37½ cent an hour rate.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; that would not compensate them sufficiently. I take it that the rural carriers of the country if paid 37½ cents an hour then their salaries would be reduced one-half.

Mr. NOLAN. It says not less than 37½ cents, and will not reduce the salary of any employee or interfere in any manner with the employees of the Postal Service or any other branch of the Government service now receiving above the rate set in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for instance, a short route. There are a few cases where the routes are no longer than 8, 9, or 10 miles.

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman substitutes are now receiving 40 cents an hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking of the rural carriers regularly employed each day, and your bill will raise the salaries of rural carriers in those cases by some four or five hundred dollars. It is not planned to reach those cases at all.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill would not reduce anybody's salary.

Mr. NOLAN. No.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman stated in his opinion all persons now in the railroad or telephone, telegraph service, or whatever it may be that the Government has taken over, are included. That was not so when the bill was originally introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. I will take a minute more. I will take just five minutes more, though I will probably not occupy that much time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it now the desire and intention of the committee that they should be?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; I think that those employees who are, after all, paid from the revenues, and I think every revenue-producing arm of the Government can be and will be operated so it will take care of the fixed expenses. Now, the telephones and telegraphs together and the railroad corporations, they are income-producing public utilities.

It can be fixed so that if we are going to operate them they will be operated on the same basis as your Postal System, and pay their way. We have recently corrected some abuses in regard to a deficiency in second-class postal rates, and that is as it should be. They ought to pay for themselves, and I think in the administration of the telegraph and telephone and the railways rates will be so arranged that they will pay the fixed expenses of salaries, wages, and anything else, and after two years any of those employees should be entitled to the benefits of the bill.

Mr. DENISON. I ask the gentleman if the railroads and telegraphs do not have to pay more than pay their way? They are expected eventually to pay some interest to the stockholders and bondholders.

Mr. NOLAN. I am in hopes we will do one thing or another before the two years will have passed, whereby they will come within the provisions of the bill. We all hope the European war will be over, and then we are going to determine what will happen.

Mr. DENISON. We have already determined that.

Mr. NOLAN. We have in a way. Every institution in this country makes fixed charges for raising wages. It is up to us to see that we have got money enough to pay them. The Director General of the Railroads raised passenger and freight rates, and stated it was for the purpose of paying the higher wages fixed by the Railroad Wage Board.

Mr. DENISON. Congress has already determined that after a certain time they will go back to the owners.

Mr. NOLAN. Who knows what another Congress might do by that time?

Mr. ESCH. In the original draft of the railroad-control bill there was a section making railroad employees Government employees, and we eliminated that from the bill because various representatives of various brotherhoods did not wish to have it incorporated, because if incorporated it made each employee subject to the compensation act.

Mr. NOLAN. Under the terms of this bill that would not be unless it was amended.

Mr. ESCH. We have the Wage Board, under the Director General's office, that takes care of that matter, anyhow.

Mr. NOLAN. I have here the original award of the Wage Commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I wanted to call attention to the fact that it was the theory and the purpose of the Postmaster General to merge the telephone and telegraph systems into the general Postal Service. In other words, to postalize the telegraph and telephone systems. There are very many of the various branches of the Postal Service that do not pay their way and some that more than pay their way, and so it does not make any particular difference whether or not these different branches are merged in the general Postal Service.

Mr. NOLAN. The present revenue bill provided a method of taking up the slack in one particular where a certain service of the Government was rendered to the publishers, and it was very costly, and we tried to modify that so the annual deficit would not be so large.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have been a Member of this House for nearly 20 years. I have never intentionally made a misstatement of facts about any Member of this House. I never have in that time attempted to take from any other Member of this House any laurel in order to build up my own reputation.

A truth half told is worse than a falsehood itself. Once upon a time a minister and an infidel were arguing Scripture. The infidel said to the minister, "I can show you in the Bible where it says, 'There is no God.'" The minister said, "You can not do anything of the kind." The infidel immediately produced a Bible and held it up and said, "Look there. It says, 'There is no God.'" "Oh, yes," the minister said, "but, you hypocrite, take your thumb off the upper line." And when he did, the passage read, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God."

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a few minutes ago on the floor of this House said that if the Republican Party came back into power—and I was not on the floor at the time he made the statement, but the information was given to me—that if the Republican Party came back into power the Republicans of this House would follow Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan, in legislation, and that Mr. FORDNEY had moved to strike out the excess-profits tax. He did not say when or where or in what bill. I want to call the attention of the House to what I did.

On February 1, 1917, before our Government had taken a part in this great war, there was a revenue bill before the House, and I did move to recommit that bill, and here is what my motion to recommit had to say:

> I move to recommit the bill H. R. 20573 to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to that committee to report the bill back to the House immediately with the following amendment: "Strike out all of title to excess-profits tax, being sections 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, and 207, reading as follows."

That was before the war. To prove to you that I was correct then and that my good bosom friend from Alabama was wrong, I voted for that motion to recommit, and Mr. HEFLIN voted against it. I contended then that I was correct in my views, and I am going to insist now that I was correct, and prove, by the remarks of a man speaking for the administration before the Ways and Means Committee a few weeks ago, to my bosom friend from Alabama, that he was wrong then and that I was right, and that I am right now and that he is wrong. Here is what Secretary McAdoo said before the Ways and Means Committee on August 14, 1918, when giving his views upon the preparation of the present revenue bill now before the Senate.

I most loyally supported and voted for every provision in that bill, and I voted for the bill:

Mr. McADOO. The excess-profits tax must rest upon the wholly indefensible notion that it is a function of taxation to bring all profits down to one level with relation to the amount of capital invested and to deprive industry, foresight, and sagacity of their fruits. The excess-profits tax exempts capital and burdens brains, ability, and energy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman very much. I read further:

The excess-profits tax falls less heavily on big business than on small business, because big business is generally overcapitalized and small business is often undercapitalized.

Mr. McAdoo said that in time of peace an excess-profits tax is indefensible. [Applause.] When I made the motion to strike from the bill the excess-profits tax provision this Government was not at war with any nation in the world. Further:

But though these great defects in the excess-profits tax lead me very strongly to recommend that you should seek additional sources of taxation in the war-profits tax and not in an increase of the excess-profits tax, I have from the beginning favored the continuance of the existing excess-profits tax, with its inequalities and its injustices, because this is not a time when the Treasury can afford to dispense with any existing source of revenue.

Therefore, let me say to the House and to my good friend, I have never used wind to get votes at home. I have never played to the galleries in the 20 years of my service in this House. I have never made a false statement intentionally against any man. [Applause.] I have never attempted to tear down any man's chimney in order to get material to build mine higher. [Applause.]

I submit to the gentleman from Alabama that the administration is with me, and here is the evidence. I was correct then. So says the Secretary of the Treasury. I am correct now. So says the Secretary of the Treasury. [Applause.] Put that in your pipe and smoke it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of the time given to me.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, under the cloak of protecting the American laboring man the House voted yesterday for a prohibition bill. I then stated that the laboring man did not seek that protection at the hands of certain gentlemen; that, on the contrary, they were opposed to the measure then pending. To-day, Mr. Chairman, we have a real measure before us that tends to do justice to the American laboring man, and I regret exceedingly that so few of those men who were so busy yesterday in behalf of the cause of labor, to which, however, labor objects, are not here to-day helping the cause of this real meritorious labor measure.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Not now. Later on.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to assure the gentleman that most of the men who voted for the prohibition amendment are here.

Mr. SABATH. I do not yield to the gentleman. I hope that the statement of the gentleman is true, and that we will find these gentlemen voting for this bill and at all times voting as solidly for the labor measures as they have voted for the prohibition measures, but I doubt it and have good reason questioning the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I assure the gentleman that they will.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, we shall shortly see.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the chairman of the Labor Committee and I congratulate the membership of the committee on reporting this bill to the House. Two years ago my committee succeeded in recommending a bill having for its purpose the same object. I then tried to amend it to include all the underpaid laboring men, because it did not go far enough, because it included only a certain class of Government employees. Therefore, I repeat that I must congratulate the Committee on Labor, and especially the chairman of that committee, in bringing in the bill before us to-day. It is a bill that is entitled to the favorable vote of every well-meaning and honest Member of this body.

I have noticed that the report accompanying this bill gives an extract from the report of Prof. Keen, of the University of Washington, as to the cost of living. We who pay some attention, and are obliged to pay some attention, to the cost of living do not need this report. We must recognize the fact and are aware that the cost of living, due to the war, has tremendously increased, and to-day it is absolutely impossible for the poorer class of laboring men even to exist, not to live, upon the small salaries they are receiving.

Having that in view, and being familiar with the conditions, I introduced last session a resolution and a bill providing for the increase of salaries of all Government employees from 10 per cent up to 25 per cent, and I regret exceedingly that we have not been able to provide that needed increase for those employees. But, on the other hand, I am mightily pleased to have the chance and the opportunity to-day to vote for this Nolan bill. I think it is a measure which will produce a great deal of good. I think it will have a tendency not only to do justice to the Government employees, but it will also have a tendency to increase the low wage to laboring men the country over. For that reason I hope this measure will be enacted without delay, not only in this House, but also at the other end of the Capitol; that it will become a law without much ado or great delay. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time to the committee.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman on the other side use some of this time?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the principle of this bill, but I am opposed to it, broadly stated, as it is. In the first place, it embraces every employee of the railroads, telephones, and telegraph. The gentleman from New York made the point awhile ago that they would not be affected at present, because they have not been two years in the employ of the Government. That is true, but there is no limitation on the life of this bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] informed the House that the railroad employees were particularly excepted as Government employees in the original railroad bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. They are not embraced as Government employees?

Mr. NOLAN. No.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is that true of the employees of the telephone and telegraph?

Mr. BLACK. It is not; and in the hearings on a bill we recently had the Solicitor of the Post Office Department gave it as his unofficial opinion that they would be employees, although he admitted that he had not looked into the matter.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is certainly one thing that should be guarded against. Then there is the other proposition, that it shall not be allowed to extend beyond the period, certainly not more than a year after the termination of the war. The gentlemen say it can be revised after the war. I think it is better to fix it so that it will have to be revised after the war, and not wait until you can get both Houses and the President to agree on the revision.

The gentleman from California stated awhile ago that it was predicted that we would have 10-cent cotton and 50-cent wheat and 50-cent corn after the war.

Mr. NOLAN. That was not my prediction.

Mr. STEVENSON. And that we would have to raise a great deal of revenue, and he did not see how it could be raised. If we are going to keep up the salaries above what they ordinarily are, that will not be one way of raising revenue with cheap corn, cheap cotton, and cheap wheat. The gentleman was right when he said that this will have a tendency to raise the wages of everybody who works, including farm labor. Take the proposition to-day, and, while I do not know much about raising other commodities, I do cotton, and every pound of cotton has to be picked. The colored women do it, and they do it better than anybody else. They do twice as much as any charwoman around here. They pick, on an average, 100 pounds a day, and it takes 15 days of labor to gather one bale of cotton; at $3 a day, you would pay $45 for gathering a bale of cotton, and you would have $5 left for the cotton when it was sold at 10 cents. You do not want to get matters arranged so that it would jack up wages to such an extent that it would stop the raising of cotton. It is the same way with regard to labor that goes into the corn and into the wheat field, and therefore it ought to be limited to the termination of the war. I agree that people are suffering from the low wages that are paid them here, and they ought to have relief. Nobody can live in the city of Washington decently on much less than $90 a month. Therefore, in so far as that part is concerned, I am in favor of the bill, but I am opposed to it being unlimited.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The bill specifically prohibits the war workers from getting the benefit of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. If they have to be here two years before they get the benefit of it, I take it that in justice this Government will give it to them before they have been here two years. If they do not, it will not accomplish the purpose for which it is intended.

There is another provision which applies to those who receive quarters and subsistence in addition to the compensation, that they shall not come into this class.

Now, the Government provides dormitories for housing. If you leave that provision in, it will apply to those living in the dormitories.

Mr. NOLAN. No; they are not receiving them as quarters; they are paying for them. The Government is providing them, but they pay rent.

Mr. STEVENSON. It will be just as well to make it clear and have no discrimination against people working, but we should limit it to one year after the war is ended.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, my attention has been repeatedly called to the very low salaries that the Federal Government pays in many lines of employment. That is true not only now when the cost of living is abnormally high, but it has been true for many years in the past. The Federal Government has inadequately paid many of its public servants even when the cost of living was much lower than it is at this time. That being the case, how important it is when the cost of living has doubled that we shall by legislation fix a reasonable, minimum wage, and from which these salaries can be graded upward.

The Committee on Appropriations of the House and the Congress has endeavored to at least partly meet the situation. Ten per cent advance last year in salaries of low-paid employees, a flat raise of $120 a year this year, provision made in the current appropriation bill whereby some increases could be paid to employees of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, who have been scandalously underpaid for years, some increase in the pay of the employees of the Asylum for the Insane and elsewhere, but generally there has been no considerable increase in years. We have reached the time when a minimum of $3 a day certainly is low enough, as a minimum above which we can adjust Federal salaries all along the line. I have some doubt of the wisdom in the provision in this bill which excludes from its benefits those who have not been employed for two years, although I understand there may be some good reason for that. If in the administration of this law, which only establishes the minimum wage, administrative officers are fair and reasonable, there will be a general advance of wages even to those who are not directly affected by the legislation. In view of that fact, unless the committee having the bill in charge agrees to it, I do not know that I shall offer an amendment which I have contemplated, striking from the bill the provision which excludes from its benefits those who have been two years in the employ of the Government. We have been very slow in advancing the wages of Government employees. We have had good service from them almost universally. They have been loyal, they have been faithful, and this is rather tardy justice to those loyal and faithful employees who have been receiving less than a living wage.

Mr. NOLAN. I desire to ask the gentleman how many requests has he over on his side?

Mr. MAHER. One.

Mr. NOLAN. I have only one on this side and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if our national prosperity and progress depends upon one thing more than another it is upon labor. I believe that the man or woman who works should receive sufficient compensation for his labor, which will not only permit him or her to purchase something to eat and wear but will permit them to lay up something in the due course of time to provide for a rainy day and give them a Christian burial. I think it is admitted and generally understood that it is difficult at the present time for a person who labors to make both ends meet and pay 50 cents for a pound of butter, 50 cents for a pound of beefsteak, 50 or 60 cents for a dozen eggs, pay twice as much for sugar, pay more for clothes, and get along now when he barely earned wages enough to subsist before high prices took place. The wage provided in this bill would just pay for board and lodging at a hotel here in Washington. I was a laboring man a considerable portion of my life and know wages were not too high then. If a person does a day's work he should get a living wage. It is not to the discredit of any person because he has to work. Labor is the principal asset of a majority of our people.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will.

Mr. GORDON. What is the minimum average wage now of Government employees?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I do not know, I will say to the gentleman, but the minimum——

Mr. GORDON. Did the committee investigate that question to see what it was?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How did you determine this would make a reasonable pay? If you did not know what wages are now, then certainly you do not know how much this increase should amount to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; we took into consideration the cost of living, and we know that the people who are working for this wage——

Mr. GORDON. You knew they wanted it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). Can not live but rather subsist upon the wage they are receiving. Why, I have heard that a man or woman sweeping the floor in one of the factories in Michigan and doing janitor work is paid $5 a day.

Mr. MADDEN. And they are sweeping up parts of the Ford machine so as to make new machines.

Mr. NOLAN. I would state to the gentleman the Committee on Labor held hearings to the extent of 423 pages, and we got from the department estimates. The total estimate of the number of employees, as well as the total cost, is in the hearings.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that wage, I understood, was about $1.60 a day, and that testimony was taken two years ago before the cost of living was so high. This is a meritorious bill. I think they will earn the wages specified, and I think if we are going to retain their employment and their services that it is necessary to give them this increase. I think I would reduce the 21 years of age to 18 years. We now enlist men to do the most severe service that is possible to impose upon them at the age of 18 years.

Mr. GORDON. And at the minimum wage—$1 a day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. At $30 a month and their keep. It was estimated before the war that each soldier cost the Government more than $1,000 per annum. With prevailing high prices, I think it costs more than that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill because I believe that it is right, but there is one provision of it I am not for, and that is that part of the bill which confines the benefits of the bill to those who have been in the employ of the Government for two years or over. The activities of the Government have increased in the District of Columbia. They have advertised for people, appealed to their patriotism to come here from all parts of the country and accept these positions, and as the various activities increase, as the higher priced salaries increase, so must the positions paying lower salaries increase, because these positions are essential to the maintenance of the whole establishment. I say it is unfair to appeal to the patriotic workers of this country to come here and help win the war and then say that they can not receive as much compensation as the man who has been in the service for over two years.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for just one moment?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Most of these clerks who come to Washington come here under civil service; and is it not a fact that practically all of them get more than $1,000 now who are coming?

Mr. FIELDS. The bill, of course, does not apply to that class.

Mr. BLACK. I am calling the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. FIELDS. I am talking about the labor. It costs one man as much to live in the District of Columbia as another.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. FIELDS. I mean in the same class of work. I am speaking as to labor; I am speaking of elevator men or clerks or laborers on the street or in whatever capacity they may be. It costs one of them just as much as it costs the other to live. The one is as patriotic as the other if he performs his task as well, and to say that a man who has been here two years shall be given an increase and the other man who is laboring by his side shall be denied that increase is class legislation. It is unfair; it is unjust. And if some other Member does not offer an amendment, I propose to do so at the proper time, striking out the words that provide for that discrimination. I am willing that it shall apply to those above 20 years. I think it would be proper to put it down to 18 years, for the two individuals who work side by side, performing the same service, should receive the same consideration. I am absolutely opposed to any such discrimination, and I hope that this House will not stand for it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I agree with the gentleman, and I desire to make this statement: It seems to me that the committee in adopting this two-year provision tried to overcome the objection of those members of the committee who argued that the allurements of a $3 minimum wage would bring a rush of employees from all over the country. I do not believe there was much to that argument of the minority, but the committee inserted that provision in order to overcome that objection. I entirely agree with the gentleman, though, that it should go out.

Mr. GORDON. Is there not something in the proposition that a man that has been employed in the same service for two years is worth more money? That principle is recognized in the Post Office Department, and they get an automatic increase of $100 a year for the first four years.

Mr. FIELDS. Many men have come from similar classes of service in the country to perform these duties. They are just as skilled; they are just as efficient; they are as strong and as willing, and they are of as much benefit as the men who have been here for a number of years.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I was interested in what the gentleman said about the discrimination. I understand this applies to the seven-hour laborers in the District of Columbia the same as it does to the eight-hour laborers elsewhere. Does the gentleman stand for that discrimination?

Mr. FIELDS. If the bill provides too much pay you should decrease it on all alike. You should not give to one man a certain salary and to another one, who is laboring by his side and doing the same service, a less salary. It is unfair and unjust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], as well as the question to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has addressed himself, overlooks the principal object of a minimum wage law. There is a certain minimum below which a worker can not be permitted to go. There is a certain compensation which can not be diminished without destroying the capacity of a human being to live the life of a man. That is the basis of minimum wage legislation. I do not know whether this bill accomplishes it, because it does not provide for a minimum compensation that one is to receive for service. It provides for a minimum rate of compensation. This is particularly true as far as persons who are employed by periods less than a whole year are concerned. This bill contains the desire for minimum wage legislation, it contains the principle. I do not believe it accomplishes a minimum compensation. The only thing valuable about it is that it fixes a certain standard, a certain basis, below which no man can safely exist. That is all there is to this minimum wage bill, and I hope there will be no opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has concluded, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the beginning of the first fiscal year following the passage of this act the minimum compensation of any person employed by the United States or by the government of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $3 per day; or if employed by the hour, not less than 37½ cents per hour; or if employed by the month, not less than $90 per month; or if employed by the year, not less than $1,080 per annum: Provided, That persons employed on a monthly or annual salary basis and who regularly perform less than a full day's service shall receive compensation at the rate of not less than 37½ cents per hour: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to persons enlisted in the military branches of the Government nor to persons receiving quarters and subsistence in addition to their compensation, nor to the employees in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the Territory of Hawaii, the Territory of Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who have been continuously in the employ of the Government of the United States or in the employ of the government of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than two years, and who shall have attained the age of 20 years.

Mr. MONDELL, Mr. BLACK, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL: Page 2, line 9, after the word "persons," strike out all the remainder of line 9 and all of lines 10, 11, and 12, down to and including the word "and."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the consideration of this bill I had in mind offering this amendment. After discussing the matter somewhat with some members of the committee, I had concluded not to offer it. But after thinking of it further, I have concluded that, in the interest of fairness, the bill should be amended as I now suggest.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my amendment is to strike from the bill that provision in it which excludes from its benefits those who have been employed by the Government less than two years. The proviso as amended then reads:

That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who shall have attained the age of 20 years.

It leaves that part of the proviso as it was, but it strikes from the bill the provision that excludes from its benefits those who have not been employed two years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there may be some arguments, I have no doubt but what there are, in favor of the provision as it stands in the bill. But against that is the unanswerable argument that there is no justice in paying one wage to a person who has been employed two years or more and a lower wage to one doing the same work but who has been employed less than two years. We should apply the same rule to all who are doing the same class of work under the same conditions.

Mr. DENISON. Is not this difference in wages, depending on the difference in length of service, recognized in the wages paid to postal clerks all through the system?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is true; because that is a class of work requiring considerable skill; but the postal clerk receives a pretty fair wage at the beginning. He receives a very fair wage at the start, a much better wage after he has become more proficient—after he has acquired more skill.

We are fixing a minimum wage, and, assuming that $3 is as low as the minimum should be fixed, on what theory, then, shall we refuse to the man or the woman who has been employed less than two years what we declare to be the reasonable minimum?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Why is the age fixed arbitrarily at 20 years?

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose it was so fixed by the committee on the theory that there are employed by the Government quite a number of people under 20 years of age——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Who are doing just as good work as the employee who is over 20.

Mr. MONDELL. They may be in certain cases, yet in many other cases they are learning their work; they are getting something of an education in the public service.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does not the gentleman's argument also hold good——

Mr. MONDELL. That is not my provision. It is in the bill as presented. If the gentleman desires to offer an amendment to that, he can do so.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thought that the gentleman, inasmuch as he is opposed to the discrimination, might perhaps offer an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman from Michigan will agree that what might be considered a fair minimum wage for a person of mature years, and possibly one with family responsibilities, might be more than a fair minimum wage for a younger person, without those responsibilities and without those expenses. I assume that was the thought of the committee when they approved that provision.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I see that element in it.

Mr. MONDELL. A young person under 20 who has not had experience or training, the committee evidently thought, should not come under the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Are amendments in order at any time, or are we considering amendments as we reach the language in the bill?

Mr. WALSH. We are acting under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Are we in committee?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are in order affecting the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. FIELDS. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment, so that it may be pending, not to come out of the time of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. I did not yield for that purpose. I think the gentleman had better follow me, and offer his amendment then.

Mr. FIELDS. All right.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House in a very brief statement to the situation that would arise if the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] were adopted. During the present session of Congress we passed the Post Office appropriation bill, which, among other things, reclassified all of the postal employees. In the former classification act the lowest grade was $800, the next grade $900, and the next grade $1,000, and from that on up to $1,200. In the reclassification plan adopted at the present session we provided that hereafter the compensation of grade 1 shall be $1,000, and grade 2 $1,100, and grade 3 $1,200, and on up to $1,500 for the sixth grade. That was the identical classification plan the letter carriers' organization favored, that the railway mail clerks' organization favored, and that the postal clerks' organization favored, and they were absolutely satisfied with it so far as I have ever heard, and all that they ask now is that we make it permanent law at the next session of Congress. But if the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is adopted, then grade 1, that now receives $1,000 a year, will receive $1,080 as soon as the law goes into effect. And what will we be confronted with at the next session of Congress?

We will be confronted with the situation that inasmuch as we have provided to pay grade 1 $1,080, that therefore grade 2 ought to be $1,180, and grade 3 ought to be $1,280, and grade 4 ought to be $1,380, and so on up. And what would it cost to make this additional increase of $80 per grade? If my memory serves me correctly, we have about 85,000 employees now in those three different employments in the Postal Service, viz: Letter carriers, postal clerks, and railway mail clerks, and the total cost of that one item alone, if we add $80 to the salary of each employee, would be $6,800,000. And so I submit that an amendment of this kind ought not to be adopted.

When the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] made his able speech in presentation of this bill I called the situation which I have just mentioned to his attention, and he gave a very satisfactory explanation by stating that the bill carried a provision reading as follows: "Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who have been continuously in the employ of the Government of the United States for a period of not less than two years." The foregoing provision saves the bill from the complication just referred to. There may be other complications of that kind, but, happening to be a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I recalled these particular instances. I think it would be very unwise for the House to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, which seeks to eliminate from the bill the provision which makes the minimum-wage requirement apply only to those Government employees who have been in the service for more than two years.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman like to have the postal employees excepted from the amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I certainly would, if the House is going to adopt your amendment. But I do not think we ought to adopt it. I think the bill is wisely written in the respect which the amendment seeks to change and ought to remain as it is. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FIELDS offers the following amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL: Page 2, line 9, strike out all of line 9 after the word "who," and all of lines 10, 11, and 12, and on line 13 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighteen," so that the proviso will read: "That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who shall have attained the age of 18 years."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offered the last part of the amendment to strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighteen" for the reason that the Government has adopted the policy of placing upon the boys of 18, 19, and 20 the labors performed by men. The most arduous labor that is performed anywhere, the military service of the country, is now laid on the shoulders of boys of that age. The country has said that they are able to perform that duty as well or better than men, and having taken that position we can not now consistently discriminate against the boys of that age who labor.

In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], I want to say that very few people affected by this bill are in the clerical positions of the Post Office Department or elsewhere. Most of the men to whom the provisions of this bill will apply are the laboring men of the District of Columbia and in Government operations throughout the country. No private institution in the country anywhere adopts a system of that character.

The private industries of the country could not run with a wage system of that sort. Suppose a manufacturing plant in my district or in yours should post a notice that it will pay those that have been with it two years or more $3 a day and those coming into the service from this time shall receive only $2.50 or $2.75 a day. Do you suppose they would get any laborers? And if they did, if circumstances forced some men to come in and take their places by the side of men that had been there two years, performing the same labor that the new employees must perform, rendering the same profit to the manufacturer as other men were rendering, would it be right to pay one $2.50 and the other $3 a day? It would not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If my friend from Kentucky will look in the paper, he will see that thing in the street railways—that they are paying men so much the first year and so much the second and so much the third.

Mr. FIELDS. That is in a class of labor that requires skill, and it takes time to acquire it. But there are men who have acquired a knowledge of the work that they are to do before they come, and they render just as good service to the Government the first day they work as the man who has been in the employ of the Government for years. Gentlemen, we can not afford to discriminate in that way. It is unfair and it is unjust.

The high cost of the laboring man has come within the last year. The great demand for labor in the Government activities of the country has developed within the last 18 months, and most of these men who have come in since this great rush started have gotten experience and serve the Government as well, do just as efficient work as the man who has been in the service for years, and yet they are discriminated against by this bill, if it passes without the amendment which I have offered, or its equivalent. Such discrimination is not right. It makes me mad to think of it. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, Members who are offering these amendments are proceeding upon a wrong theory. This bill was never intended as a war-emergency measure or to take effect to-day to meet present-day conditions. It is a proposition to establish a principle, the principle of the living wage. If gentlemen will read the bill, they will find in the very first section that after the beginning of the fiscal year next after the passage of this act it takes effect. If the bill passes the House and goes to the Senate and passes there before the 4th of next March, it does not go into effect until the beginning of the next fiscal year, and that will give the Appropriations Committee an opportunity to investigate the cost of it and make appropriations accordingly.

If you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, you might as well adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS]. If this were a temporary measure, if it were for the existence of the war, the arguments would be good. This measure will have a beneficial influence. The people that are coming here today are not the people employed at low salaries. I will say also that the great mass of the employees in the District of Columbia, when we had the bill under consideration, were getting $1.50 and $1.75, and since that time I have made careful inquiry into it and they are now receiving in the District of Columbia, the laborer on the streets $3.25 a day plus 40 cents provided in the annual increase of $120. They had trouble and went out on a strike, but they have fixed the wages now so that they get, as I say, $3.25 for an eight-hour day, plus 40 cents, which makes $3.65.

There are a class of employees in the District of Columbia that will get the benefit of it. They are the watchmen, elevator operators, the firemen, and a lot of other employees. The most of them have been here over two years and will get the benefit of this bill. You can not hire men to-day in the District of Columbia for the amount of money provided in this bill.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. It will apply to every customhouse in the country where watchmen are engaged?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely; but gentlemen are talking about men coming here to-day. The idea of the bill is to provide permanent legislation to give some consideration to these employees who have seen long service. We had before our committee one man from the Printing Office down here, a laborer, in 1916, who 30 years before came from the city of Cleveland and received compensation for his services of $2 a day.

And the day he came before our committee, 30 years after, he was receiving the same pay of $2 a day. That is the situation we are trying to take care of in this bill. If it was an emergency measure, we would have an emergency provision, but this is permanent legislation. We are trying to do something of permanent benefit to the lower-paid employees. The two-year limit was placed in and the 20-year age provision, because we felt that those who go into the Federal service go in generally at 18 years of age and we wanted to prohibit the payment of this money, $3 a day, $90 a month, to messenger boys of 16 years of age and under and we are trying to establish permanently a living wage. It is not for to-day or to-morrow, but it is for all time. That is the principle underlying this bill.

Mr. FIELDS. I will say my amendment does not apply to the 16-year-old boy.

Mr. NOLAN. I say that if the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is adopted we might as well adopt the gentleman's amendment, but the idea of the committee, it was not in the original draft of the bill, was to give some consideration to those who have been longest employed.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. This bill was no doubt drafted before the beginning of the present fiscal year. Does the gentleman propose to offer an amendment so as to make it effective at once because otherwise it will be postponed until the 1st of July of next year and will not meet the emergency.

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman the sooner it goes into effect the better I would be satisfied. I have not any illusions about its speedy passage in the Senate. They will be engaged upon the war-revenue bill and if we can get it through before the 4th of March I think it will be looking to a permanent benefit and everybody will be satisfied to get it. Those who are interested have not asked for this amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. I want to submit this observation to the gentleman. Probably the organizations have not, maybe a few men who have been employed less than two years have not gone into the organization, but a man does not have to belong to an organization to get my ear if his cause is right, for I have just as much interest in a man who does not belong to an organization as a man in an organization.

Mr. NOLAN. My time is running along.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. One minute more. I will say there is no one in this House who questions my sincerity or my interest in the welfare of the man down below.

Mr. FIELDS. I am not questioning that.

Mr. NOLAN. But we are trying to do the big thing in this. I have the kindliest sympathy in the world for everybody who has come in within the last two years, but what I am interested in is that when this bill eventually passes that those in the Government employ sometime will get the benefit, and if we load the bill down it is going to meet with more determined opposition.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman's opinion is that this amendment should be defeated?

Mr. NOLAN. I think the bill ought to be left as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the author of this bill that there is any difference between the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky and the proposal of the gentleman from Wyoming. There is a radical difference, because one seeks to apply the minimum wage to those of 18 years and above, and the bill as reported by the committee to those only above 20 years of age. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are hundreds of high-school students who are brought into the Bureau of Standards to receive advanced education who receive a nominal salary as low as $540 or $660, who receive this nominal salary in return for the education they receive, who would be entitled to the $3 a day minimum if 18 years was the limit, who would not be entitled to it if 20 was the limit. I think the committee—and I believe the chairman will bear me out—fixed 20 years so as not to apply to these messenger boys. We have around the Bureau of Pensions, for instance, a large number of messenger boys who came into the service at 16 and have remained there. They receive only $480 a year, and when they reach the age of 20 or thereabout they are promoted to the position of messengers. Well may we pay those men that take the position of messengers higher salaries, but I do not think any person here wishes to pay that character of employment the minimum wage of $3 a day. They have no families dependent upon them. Over in the Library of Congress we have a large number of young ladies who come into service there who receive instructions in the way of library operation at a nominal salary of $600 and $660 a year, under 20 years of age. It is not contemplated paying these young ladies who are single the minimum wage. This bill will undoubtedly apply to many who have no families dependent upon them, but we can not avoid that because it is a general measure. In the Committee on Appropriations I attempted this last session to have some permanent increase of salary made of these lower-paid officials who will be benefited by this bill, particularly messengers who receive $840; assistant messengers, $720; watchmen, $720; firemen, $720; and laborers, $660. Some consideration was given to my proposition, but it was the opinion of the subcommittee that no legislation increasing salaries permanently should be enacted at this session. My personal opinion is these men are underpaid and would be underpaid even with the $120 horizontal increase. I do not think any person, considering the large number of employees in the service under 20, can vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. As to the question whether the employees should be two years in the service, that is another question. I am merely directing attention to the maximum age limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "postmasters" strike out the colon, insert a comma, and add the following: "assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks."

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. This takes care of the classified service in the Post Office Department?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. The committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have it read again.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALMON as substitute for the Madden amendment: Page 2, line 7, strike out all of lines 7 and 8, as follows: "nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "nor to any postal employees of the United States."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was recognized on my amendment, was I not? And I would like to have the whole paragraph read with the amendment included, so that the Members will understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read as requested.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the provisions of this act shall not apply to persons enlisted in the military branches of the Government nor to persons receiving orders and subsistence in addition to their compensation, nor to the employees in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the Territory of Hawaii, the Territory of Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this amendment provides for exemption from the provisions of this law all the men who have been classified in the Postal Service. In 1907 postal employees were classified into six different grades. The first class received $600, the second class $800, the third class $900, the fourth class $1,000, the fifth class $1,100, and the sixth class $1,200. The recent classification makes the first class $1,000, the second class $1,100, the third class $1,200, the fourth class $1,300, the fifth class $1,400, and the sixth class $1,500. In the Railway Mail Service they are classified as follows, namely, beginning at $1,100 and going up to $2,000. This will leave the classification act, which protects and provides for the postal clerks, the carriers, the rural carriers, and the railway mail clerks, intact, and it will enable the Post Office Committee in its annual appropriation bill to make proper provision for the compensation of these men. It will enable us to make the temporary legislation which was enacted by this session of Congress permanent in the next session of the Congress, as it was the intention to do. If the legislation proposed does not exempt these classes of men it will complicate the situation so that in the end they will be the losers by the classification act which is already on the statute books.

Now, to men below those who are in the carrier forces, such as janitors, laborers, and so forth, the pending bill will apply, and we have no objection to that, but it ought not to apply to the men that I have referred to. And the proposal of the gentleman in his substitute for the amendment I have offered will not only exempt the men without specifying the classes to which they belong, but it will also exempt the laborers and the janitors. And I do not think they ought to be exempted from the provisions of the pending bill. So, as a matter of fact, the substitute for the amendment which I have presented ought not to be adopted, while the amendment itself should.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I do not recall right now, and I would like to ask the gentleman what is the lowest salary of a third-class postmaster?

Mr. MADDEN. It is $1,000.

Mr. WINGO. Under the present arrangement?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr WINGO. What is the maximum of a fourth-class postmaster?

Mr. MADDEN. The maximum of a fourth-class postmaster goes up to $1,000, and when he reaches $1,000 he becomes a third-class postmaster.

Mr. WINGO. And a postmaster now getting $1,000 has to give all of his time, practically, to the office?

Mr. MADDEN. The salary of the postmaster is based on the receipts of the office, and if this should apply to him it would make a new basis for calculations in the postal system.

Mr. WINGO. And your theory is to leave untouched that branch of the service which has been very scientifically classified, based upon experience?

Mr MADDEN. That is the point; and leave the laborer and other classes of work that are not scientifically adjusted to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. HOUSTON. What class of employees embraced in your amendment are not now getting $1,000?

Mr. MADDEN. There are not any

Mr HOUSTON. Then what will be the effect of your amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. To exempt them so as to continue them in their own classification. However, I beg the gentleman's pardon. There are some rural carriers with 7 or 8 mile routes that are not getting $1,000 a year, but they ought not to get the compensation carried in this bill, because they are required to work only two or three hours a day. They ought not to be included.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman will recall that when the Post Office bill was pending I tried to get an amendment to his amendment to take care of the village carriers. Now, I looked it up at that time, and I saw that they were getting $63.75 a month. I think we increased it 10 or 15 per cent, so that they get $73 or $74 a month—less than $75.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty per cent, I think.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now they get $75 or $76 a month. Would your amendment include village carriers?

Mr. MADDEN. No; carriers in the City Delivery Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes in order to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if he would except from the purview of the pending measure special-delivery messengers, who are paid on the pro rata basis of 8 cents per letter?

Mr. MADDEN. Special-delivery messengers are not employed by the Government, either by the month or by the day, or by the hour. They are employed as messengers and compensated for the carriage of each letter, and they are not considered as Government employees in the strict meaning of the term. That was ruled upon in the case of an injury, for example, of a special-delivery messenger. When we had the compensation act applying to postal employees under consideration it was provided that postal employees injured in the line of duty should be paid a compensation of full pay for a year during the disability and half pay for the second year, and the family of the employee, in case the employee died from the injury, was to be given $2,000. In the case of a special-delivery messenger coming under the injury clause of the bill, it was ruled that he was not in a technical sense an employee of the Government, and hence did not fall under the provisions of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill under consideration is very broad in its phraseology. It says, "Any person employed by the United States shall receive not less than $3 a day." But I want to direct the gentleman's attention to another class of employees as to which I have some doubt, and that is those who are in charge of contract stations. They are Government employees, receiving on an average of from $300 to $1,000 a year.

Mr. MADDEN. They enter into a contract with the Government of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would this bill cover them?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it would not cover them.

Mr. STAFFORD. But they are employees.

Mr. MADDEN. They are contract employees.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are Government employees.

Mr. MADDEN. They may be, but not in the sense that this bill provides for. Those people to whom the gentleman refers enter into a contract with the Government of the United States to conduct the business of the sale of stamps in drug stores and other places at a fixed compensation per annum, depending entirely upon the volume of the sales. If the sales amount to a certain sum they get a certain compensation. If they amount to less than that they get less, and if they amount to more they get more. But this bill would not cover them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I offered this substitute with the idea that the recent legislation fixing the compensation of postal employees was reasonably satisfactory to all the postal employees except fourth-class postmasters and village delivery carriers.

But with the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], calling attention to certain other postal employees who are not embraced in the provisions of the recent compensation law, and in view of the fact that the compensation of fourth-class postmasters can not be taken care of and provided for by this measure, and in view of the further fact that the gentleman's amendment provides for and takes in and permits under the provisions of this law an increase in the compensation of village delivery mail carriers, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] asks unanimous consent that his substitute may be considered as withdrawn. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 2, line 1, after the word "hour," insert the following language: "Provided further, That the language 'a full day's service' as herein used shall be construed to mean that eight hours shall be deemed a day's work, and the same shall be the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for the service of all employees included within the terms of this act."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, under our present law, as I understand it, the Government employees who live outside of the District of Columbia work already an eight-hour day, and under the provisions of the bill, in cases where they receive the minimum wage of $90 a month, or $1,080 a year, they would receive that amount of compensation based on an eight-hour day of labor. As to them, that would be the standard measurement of their pay and they would therefore receive the rate of 37½ cents for each hour they actually worked—$3 a day.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment, please; when I have completed this statement I shall be glad to. Now, the rule is different here in the District.

In the District of Columbia, while there have been a good many assertions to the contrary, yet we all know that most of the employees work only seven hours a day. When the Borland amendment was several times before the House we often heard it said that most of the Government clerks in Washington are working eight hours a day, anyhow. Now, if that statement be true, then they will not be affected by my amendment at all.

I want to call your further attention to the fact that this amendment which I have offered is not the Borland proposition at all, because it does not require any department to change its hours of labor, but it simply follows the language of that provision of the Adamson law that we passed in September, 1916, and says that you shall use eight hours as the standard of measurement for reckoning the compensation of an employee, and therefore if a Government employee here in the District of Columbia only works seven hours a day he would get a minimum wage of $2.62½. That is to say, it does not change any employee's compensation if it is above the minimum now, but if it is below that and he is to get the benefit of a minimum wage, then he must work eight hours to get the full $3 a day, and if he only works seven hours, then he would not receive the full day's pay, but compensation at the rate of $2.62½ per day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, this law is being made to cover all the Government employees throughout the United States, and therefore it should be uniform.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the gentleman that it should be uniform. My purpose is simply to establish a uniform eight-hour day for Government employees who are to be the beneficiaries of this minimum-wage law. My amendment provides practically the same definition for a standard eight-hour day as was contained in the Adamson law, and I have defined it so that when you come to use the yardstick for measuring a day's pay you will use the eight-hour yardstick.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has answered the question I intended to propound to him. As I understand it, his amendment would exclude from the benefits of this law practically all of the Government employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLACK. Not at all. It excludes nobody.

Mr. MONDELL. It would exclude all those who did not work eight hours.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no. Let me read the amendment I have offered. If you will turn to page 2, line 1, you will see that I am correct. Insert the following language——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In a moment. You will see that it does not exclude anybody. It says:

Provided further, That the language, "a full day's service," as herein used, shall be construed to mean that eight hours shall be deemed a day's work, and the same shall be the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for the service of all employees included within the terms of this act.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If a man works less than eight hours then he comes under the other provisions of 37½ cents an hour.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Virginia asked if it was not true that any Government employee working less than eight hours would come under the hourly compensation for 37½ cents an hour, which is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. In what way does the gentleman's amendment differ from the Borland amendment? The gentleman knows what happened to the Borland amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I think if the gentleman from Illinois will pause to consider the two propositions for a moment that he will grasp at once the distinction. The Borland amendment provided that no Government employee should be paid under the particular appropriation unless he worked eight hours a day. I do not make any such provision. The amendment I have offered does not make any flat requirement that eight hours shall be worked, but simply says that the yardstick for measuring shall be eight hours, and therefore if an employee does not work eight hours he will be paid 37½ cents per hour for the time that he does work. That seems absolutely equitable to me, and I do not see how any fair-minded man can oppose it.

Mr. NOLAN. I will tell the House what this yardstick will do. I thought the Borland amendment was disposed of by the President's veto. The gentleman's yardstick would apply to those who come under the provisions of the bill. In other words, the low-paid employee of the District of Columbia who works seven hours would be required to work eight hours to get $3 a day, and those who got beyond $1,080—and they are here by the thousand as compared with the small number of lower-salaried persons—could still work seven hours a day and get their compensation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Was it not contended by the opponents of the Borland amendment that practically all the Government employees in the District of Columbia now work eight hours a day?

Mr. NOLAN. Oh, no; the gentleman is wrong. It was contended that all of the employees of the District of Columbia were subject to any orders that the department chief might make requiring them to work eight hours a day. All the employees except in mechanical establishments in the District of Columbia work seven hours a day. Your amendment to the minimum-wage bill would make the fellow down below—and I know the gentleman does not want to discriminate between the $1,080 employee and the $1,800 employee——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 14, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the word "military," in line 2, page 2, insert the words "or naval." The purpose of offering that——

Mr. NOLAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman. If that will clarify it any in the opinion of the gentleman, very well. The committee thought that military branch covered both the Army and the Navy. If it makes it any more definite, we have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "years," insert the words: "Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall be operative for and during the period of the existing war."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering the amendment is that the bulk of evidence, as I read it in the report, bases the increase of salary on the increase of the cost of living. It is to make the salary or wage commensurate with the cost of living, and the increased cost of living is largely, if not wholly, attributed to the war conditions now prevailing. I think, gentlemen of the committee, it is an unwise policy to make a permanent basis of a war standard or war measurement of wage or wage conditions. It is very unfortunate at this hour and this day that we are asked to fix and project into the future permanent policies; policies for peace but policies arising out of war. We do not know what will occur when this war is over. We do not know what retrenchments, if any, will have to be made; what expenditures will have to be paid. I think it is unwise to travel under present disturbed and abnormal conditions any further than we can see. For that reason I have submitted the amendment for the consideration of the committee. If we deal with the immediate necessities, and they are many, the inexorable exigencies, and they are immeasurably great, confronting us, we will best discharge our duty.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, if the proposition was one to increase wages based upon war conditions I admit that the gentleman's position would be well taken. However, this minimum-wage law that is proposed is one that can well stand on its merits under any conditions that are likely to exist after this war closes. Of course, we can modify any existing law, the gentleman from Virginia well knows. If at any time modification or change is justified, it can be made. But there is no question, Mr. Chairman, that now we can well enact this minimum-wage law with the expectation that it will be permanent because of its moderation, because of the fact that it only establishes such a minimum wage as under almost any circumstances ought to exist. Mr. Chairman, we ought to understand that the Government is the largest employer of labor in the world to-day, not only in this country but in the world. We ought to set such standards of justice to the employees of the Government as would not be a disgrace or a reflection upon the Government as an employer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I just wanted to make myself clear in that respect to the gentleman from Iowa. It was for that very reason we might establish a just standard that animated my amendment. I fear in a period of this sort we could not reach an approximate continuous standard of justice.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman's position is justifiable, and if we were establishing any exaggerated standard I would entirely agree with him, but I am trying to make it clear that it is so reasonable, that the minimum is so small, that under any possible existing condition there is no necessity for now limiting the minimum fixed in the bill to the termination of this war. Now, I was about to say that it is an unfortunate fact that the great corporations are dealing much more justly, much more generously, in many instances with their employees than the Government of the United States is to-day. They are giving to their employees higher wages, better conditions. They are giving to their employees pensions, housing provisions, and profit-sharing privileges that make the Government service not the best service, not the most just to the laboring men and laboring women who are employed by it. And when a proposition of this kind is so moderate in establishing a minimum wage law it seems to me that we would do an injustice to the laboring men of this country, to the laboring men especially who are employed by the Government, if we should place any limitation whatever upon it. For that reason I think the committee ought to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the colon, following the word "hour," insert the following: "Provided further, That the minimum compensation of any person employed as a teacher in the schools of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $4 a day with full pay during vacation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if there is any class of employees in the world who should be paid a decent living wage it is the teachers into whose daily charge is placed the training of our children. I was told by a lady teacher in the District this morning that on last Saturday she was loyal and patriotic enough to resign a position paying her $125 a month to resume her place in the schools yesterday morning at a salary of only $86, and that salary is paid only during the school session and not during vacation. Is there a man in this House, a Member of this Congress, who approves of such unjust, niggardly treatment, who can look a teacher of children in the face and say, "I will permit such a condition to continue to exist. I will permit you trained instructors to continue to draw only $86 a month, and that, too, for only nine months a year," when inexperienced, untrained girls and boys can go into any department of this Government to-day, whether they show any facility for business or not, and draw a salary of at least $83 a month? Why, I have had inexperienced young people from my district come here without any experience in business life whatever and immediately enter the Government employ upon a salary that pays them at least $83 a month. I think it is a shame and a disgrace that we should permit our teachers to be paid such a measly, little, indecent compensation.

Mr. ALMON. If it is a shame and a disgrace to do that in the District of Columbia, is it not a shame and a disgrace to do it in Texas or any other State?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it is, and for 20 years in Texas I have been fighting for decent living wages for the teachers of my country.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. REED. What days would you apply this $4 to in the year when the teacher labors for five days?

Mr. BLANTON. She is employed by the month; therefore she would get $120 a month as a minimum wage for 12 months in the year; and no one should ask a teacher to watch over, educate, train, and care for our children nine months of each year for a less wage than that. A man can not vote against a proposition like this and look the teachers of the land in the face——

Mr. KEARNS. Is the gentleman sure he has put a correct interpretation upon the language of his amendment? It was $4 for 30 days——

Mr. BLANTON. Because the other provisions of the bill, where there is monthly employment, would make the $4 applicable to the whole 30 days.

Mr. KEARNS. Why not say it, then—a minimum of $120 a month?

Mr. BLANTON. The balance of my amendment makes it clear, during vacation as well.

Mr. KREIDER. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I think, if his amendment would prevail and the wages should be based on that amendment, she would get $80 a month and no more.

Mr. BLANTON. No; she would get $4 per day, by the month, totaling $120 per month, because she is paid by the month.

Mr. KREIDER. This provision says $4 a day. Twenty days constitutes a month for a teacher, and that is $80 a month; and that is all you would get by your amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. My amendment, under the terms of the bill, clearly and distinctly provides for a minimum wage for teachers of $120 per month the year round, vacation and all, and I regret that my time is exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGSDALE: Page 2, line 13, after the word "years," insert "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person unless the head of the department in which he or she is employed shall certify that the service they perform is necessary and is being satisfactorily performed."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I only want to take a moment. The civil-service law at this time provides a remedy for the evils the gentleman speaks of. If you want to provide an opportunity for favoritism, put an amendment of this kind into law. I think what you need in the civil service here in the District of Columbia—and I am not speaking of any place else, because I do not know anything about it—is that, instead of bringing more employees here into the District of Columbia as war workers, you have a readjustment and see that they perform a fair day's service around these departments. Then you would accomplish something. I am not looking, as one who favors this bill, to making any sinecures. Any employee that does not perform a decent day's work for the compensation received, whether that compensation be small, intermediate, or large, ought to be discharged. The sooner we have readjustment the better, but do no put a provision in this bill that will cause discrimination and favoritism.

Mr. RAGSDALE. How else can you remedy the condition about which I have spoken than in the manner which I have suggested?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. To offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 1, after the colon, following the word "hour" insert the following: "Provided further, That the minimum compensation of any teacher in the schools of the District of Columbia shall not be less than $1,440 per year."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to use up any time of the committee except to place the responsibility for this question upon the membership of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 35.

Mr. BLANTON. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. POU, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 152) to fix the compensation of certain employees in the United States, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Mr. HAMLIN, of Missouri, to preside as Speaker pro tempore for to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committee of conference on the amendments of the House to the bills of the following titles:

S. 4194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4543. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4722. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THOMPSON, indefinitely, on account of making liberty-loan speeches;

To Mr. DOMINICK, for one week, on account of illness in his family;

To Mr. HELVERING, for four days, on account of illness;

To Mr CANNON, for Wednesday, September 25, 1918;

To Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH, indefinitely, on account of assisting in the liberty-loan campaign; and

To Mr. JACOWAY (at the request of Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas), for three days, on account of important business.

MINIMUM-WAGE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. At this time is it in order to make a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. No. That comes after the third reading. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. To make a motion to recommit this bill back to the Committee on Labor, with instructions to report it back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 2, line 1, after the colon following the word "hour," insert the following——

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is anybody in the House opposed to it who wants to make a motion to recommit? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas. Now the gentleman can state the instruction.

Mr. BLANTON. With the following amendment: On page 2, line 1, after the colon following the word "hour," insert the following: "Provided further, That the compensation of any teacher in the schools of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $1,200 per annum."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the rules require that a motion to recommit must be reduced to writing.

Mr. BLANTON. I have the amendment already here in writing.

Mr. RAGSDALE. We have not time to wait. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide for that, of course.

Mr. BLANTON. I have it here in writing, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Labor with instructions to report it back forthwith, with the following amendment: On page 2, line 1, after the colon following the word "hour," insert "Provided further, That the minimum compensation of any person employed as a teacher in the schools of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $1,200 per annum."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighteen Members have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-nine gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the Chair announces the vote. On this vote the ayes are 18 and the noes are 89.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Only 103 gentlemen have risen—not a quorum. There is an automatic call of the House. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 200, answered "present" 4, not voting 155, as follows:

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAHER and Mr. NOLAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 252, nays 16, answered "present" 6, not voting 156, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. PAIGE.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. ELSTON.

On this vote:

Mr. PAIGE (for) with Mr. GREENE of Vermont (against).

Mr. PHELAN (for) with Mr. RAGSDALE (against).

Mr. SCULLY (for) with Mr. WEBB (against).

Mr. TREADWAY (for) with Mr. GARNER (against).

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with my colleague, Mr. KETTNER, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

Mr. IRELAND's name was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. LUFKIN. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, Mr. TREADWAY and Mr. GALLIVAN, of Massachusetts, are detained in Massachusetts. If they were here, they would vote "yea."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the same announcement on behalf of Mr. OLNEY, who is unavoidably absent.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I was recorded as voting "yea." I am paired with Mr. PHELAN, of Massachusetts. I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present." If Mr. PHELAN were present, he would vote "yea," and I would vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was making a desperate effort. I got here just at the edge; I was just in and just out, and I was making a desperate effort to get here. That is the truth about it. I was not clear in, I want to say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote except "present."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will vote "present."

The name of Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. LITTLEPAGE, is unavoidably absent and he asked me to say that if he were present he would vote "yea" on this vote.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that Mr. SCULLY and Mr. HAMILL, of New Jersey, are away attending the primary election in that State to-day and send word that if they were present they would vote "yea" on the passage of this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. NOLAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to do away with Calendar Wednesday business for to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire what business it is expected will come up?

Mr. KITCHIN. We want to consider the bill that the Post Office Committee has reported with respect to telephone and telegraph lines. Then there is the bill from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, one on which there has been reported a rule. Then they desire to go into, as soon as possible, the rule to take up the consideration of the Sims emergency power bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, may I make a further inquiry of the gentleman? In view of the fact that so many are desirous of leaving, can the gentleman inform us what the program is for the next week or two?

Mr. KITCHIN. We hope to get through with these bills, and we hope we can get a gentlemen's recess agrement after we finish them; and we can finish them this week, and so have unanimous consents on next Monday. Then, I think, we will be in a position to consider a gentlemen's agreement for three-day recesses until the Senate is ready to pass on the revenue bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it contemplated in the program of legislation to take up for consideration the bill that has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to amend the espionage act?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not heard of that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I am very much interested in that. I think it is a very serious piece of legislation and one that the House ought to seriously consider if it takes it up at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. That has not been called to my attention, and I had not that in contemplation. Of course we could not make a gentlemen's agreement recess except by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MAGEE. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] if we could not have a day for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we could get through with these bills this week, we could.

Mr. MAGEE. How can we tell anything about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Stay here and watch it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The reason we want to dispense with Calendar Wednesday is to go on with these bills and get them passed as early as possible, so that we can get away.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the aim of the leader of the majority was, when he presented the revenue bill, to get that bill out of the way and then take up for consideration the bills that were to be reported under the rule of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and then conclude business at once.

Mr. KITCHIN. We want to do that and then try to arrange a gentlemen's agreement, but if every man is interested in a bill and wants it passed before we take a recess, we can not get a gentlemen's agreement.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not have a gentlemen's agreement, if I may be permitted to inject a remark, until you pass the appropriation bill that is pending. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that next Monday is not Unanimous-Consent Calendar day and for suspension of the rules. It is the fifth Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. My thought was we might get unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If you get it, it is all right.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am going to object to Unanimous-Consent day here until a bill now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is considered by the House that gives relief, to which they are entitled, to men who are injured by the railroads. Under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and Director General of the Railroads, and sundry other titles which he has, that gentleman has issued a rule, and I do not know what he draws from, that men may not collect judgments when passed upon favorably by courts of final resort in this country, until he has approved them. There is a bill which has been introduced here by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that seeks to correct that.

Mr. MADDEN. Is he superior to the courts?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Under the rule he has made I understand he reserves the right to himself to review any of the cases that have been passed upon by courts of final jurisdiction and to determine whether or not he will pay these judgments even when they are passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Who does this?

Mr. RAGSDALE. The Director General of the Railroads.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am now asking to dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I offer the following rule——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin raise the point of no quorum?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation to provide suitable additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of soldiers and sailors and others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service (H. Doc. No. 1294); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for contingencies of the Army, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1295); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. Letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Public Printer, submitting additional estimates of appropriation, required by the Public Printer for public printing and binding, and for leaves of absence, Government Printing Office, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1296); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DEWALT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4871) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River, from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the Borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 804), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12982) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a large dry dock and appurtenant lands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 810), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. COOPER of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 12995) granting the consent of Congress to the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a combined bridge and dam across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12996) granting the consent of Congress to the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12997) granting the consent of Congress to the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 12998) to amend section 3528 of the Revised Statutes; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARNHART: A bill (H. R. 12999) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Thomas Newton Swearingen, and to grant him an honorable discharge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COADY: A bill (H. R. 13000) granting a pension to Emma Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENSLEY: A bill (H. R. 13001) granting an increase of pension to Joseph R. McKeever; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. A bill (H. R. 13002) granting an increase of pension to Charles O. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENTON: A resolution (H. Res. 436) to pay to W. Ray Loomis extra compensation for compiling the Weekly Compendium and Monthly Compendium; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. CANTRILL: A resolution (H. Res. 437) providing for the consideration of H. R. 12917; to the Committee on Rules.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CAREW: Resolution of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, concerning the housing problem; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Federal Guards Relief Association for increase of pay; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of the National Women's Trade-Union League, for the Nolan minimum-wage bill (H. R. 152); to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. RAKER: Letter of Frank Morrison, secretary American Federation of Labor, urging the passage of House bill 152; to the Committee on Labor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 25, 1918.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by Mr. HAMLIN as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that the great war in which we are engaged is not a war of one man nor of any set of men, but is preeminently a war of the people, in which sectionalism, sectarianism, and party affiliations have been reduced to the lowest minimum; lost in the higher and purer principles of patriotism, in which the people are ready and willing to sacrifice means and men to secure liberty and human rights for all men and for all nations, great or small, that militarism and autocracy shall be swept from the face of the earth, to Thy glory and to the good of all men.

We thank Thee for the signal success of our arms, and those of our allies, east, west, north, and south.

Continue, we beseech Thee, to favor liberty, truth, and justice. In His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LETTER FROM AN AMERICAN SOLDIER IN FRANCE.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk, to be read in my time, a letter received this morning from one of the brave boys who are now fighting in France.

Mr. GARNER. What is the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes, with the request, which was granted, to have a letter read at the desk in his time. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN RED CROSS,
Convalescent Camp, August 24, 1918.

Hon. RICHARD ELLIOTT.

DEAR FRIEND: I suppose you think I am slow in writing to you as I promised when in your office along about the 21st of April. If you will remember, I am the marine that you wrote the will for on that date, for which I am very grateful. I hope I can some day fully repay you for this kindness.

A few hours after my visit to your office I was on my way to a port here in France. I wasn't here but a short time until I got my first introduction to the Fritzies. We gave a good account of ourselves, as I guess you read in the papers along about the first part of June. They brought up the Prussians (the picked troops of Germany), but they all looked the same to us. What was left of the Huns in this sector had to say "the marines are some fighters." They call us "devil dogs." It was but a short time after I got at the front that I realized this game was a man's job, but the Americans have proven they are equal to the occasion. The day of the Germans starting or taking the offensive is a thing of the past.

Along the middle of June I got some of the poison gas, which has kept me from the front ever since. At present I am getting along fine. My eyes bother me some, but I think they will soon be all right and that I will soon be allowed to return for another crack at them. I don't think they will put over much gas any way soon, unless they invent some device to shoot from their backs, as they are constantly on the retreat.

I read an American-printed paper every night. The way the people over in the States are buying liberty loans, thrift stamps, assisting the Red Cross, and doing everything possible to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion certainly makes us boys feel good. We know they are all in back of us. I have had a lot of wonderful experiences since here that I hope I will have the opportunity of telling to you some day.

I must close for this time. With best wishes, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

PVT. THOS. H. FELTZ,
Ninety-sixth Company, Sixth Marines,
Convalescent Camp, Hospital Center,
A. P. O. 785, Allerey (S.-et-L.),
American Expeditionary Force.

O. K.

JACK ALLAN,
Lieutenant, Seventh Infantry.

[Applause.]

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 803).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11259, respecting minerals and metals for war purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the conference report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the conference report be read. The Clerk will proceed to read the report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, and to the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to provide for an adequate and increased supply, to facilitate the production, and to provide for an equitable, economical, and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit: Antimony, arsenic, ball clay, bismuth, bromine, cerium, chalk, chromium, cobalt, corundum emery, fluorspar, ferrosilicon, fullers' earth, graphite, grinding pebbles, iridium, kaolin, magnesite, manganese, mercury, mica, molybdenum, osmium, sodium, platinum, palladium, paper clay, phosphorus, potassium, pyrites, radium, sulphur, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, and zirconium, as the President may, from time to time, determine to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and as to which there is at the time of such determination, a present or prospective inadequacy of supply. The aforesaid substances mentioned in any such determination are hereinafter referred to as necessaries.

"SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of same, to provide storage facilities for and store the same, to provide or improve transportation facilities, and to use, distribute, or allocate said necessaries, or to sell the same at reasonable prices, but such sales made during the war shall not be at a price less than the purchase or cost of production thereof: Provided, That no such contract of purchase shall cover a period longer than two years after the termination of the war.

"The President is further authorized, upon finding that importation into the United States of any of the necessaries covered by this act is likely to result in a loss to the United States on any necessaries which it may have acquired hereunder, to ascertain, fix, and proclaim such rate of duty upon such imported necessaries as shall be sufficient to adequately protect the United States from any such loss.

"The funds provided by section 6 hereof shall be used in carrying out the powers granted by this section, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal of such necessaries, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the object of this act has been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated idle land, deposit, or mine, and any idle or partially operated smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing said necessaries, or either of them, and to develop and operate such mine or deposit or such smelter or plant, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner, and to store, use, distribute, allocate, or sell the products thereof: Provided, That no ores or metals, the principal money value of which consists in metals or minerals other than those specifically enumerated in section 1 hereof, shall be subject to requisition under the provisions of this act. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, so acquired, is no longer essential for the objects aforesaid, the same shall be returned to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto. The United States shall make just compensation, determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, or operation by the Government of any such necessaries, or any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto, such person, firm, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145, of the Judicial Code.

"The President is authorized to require statements and reports, to examine books and papers, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act. The fund provided by section 6 hereof may be used in carrying out the purposes of this act, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use, operation, or disposal of any such necessaries, land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 4. That any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct the enforcement of or the compliance with any such requisition or order, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation adopted hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 5. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1919, for the payment of all administrative expenses under this act, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, the payment of rent, the purchase of equipment, supplies, postage, printing, publications, and such other articles, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential and proper.

"SEC. 6. That the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with all moneys received from time to time under the provisions of this act, all of which shall be credited to said appropriation, shall be used as a revolving fund for carrying out the objects of this act, and for the purpose of making all payments and disbursements, including just compensation under section 3, by this act authorized: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the last preceding section: Provided further, That a detailed report of all operations under this act, including all receipts and disbursements, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month, covering the preceding month's operation. Any balance of said revolving fund remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 7. That the President is authorized to exercise each, every, or any power and authority hereby vested in him, and to expend the moneys herein appropriated or provided for, or any part or parts thereof, by and through such officer or officers, department or departments, board or boards, agent, agents, or agencies as he shall create or designate from time to time for this purpose. He may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of such services, but no official or employee of the United States shall receive any additional compensation for such services except as now permitted by law: Provided, That no person employed under the provisions of this act shall be paid any salary or compensation in excess of that paid for similar or like services rendered in executive departments of the Government.

"SEC. 8. No person having a pecuniary interest in any transaction in pursuance of this act shall have any official connection under this act with such transaction. Any person violating this provision shall forfeit to the Government all proceeds which he shall have received from such transaction, and upon due conviction of such violation shall be fined not exceeding $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding 10 years.

"SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, if in his judgment such action be necessary or useful for the objects of this act, to form one or more corporations under the laws of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, for the purpose of carrying out the powers or any of the powers hereby authorized. The capital stock of any such corporation shall be such as the President may determine, but the total capital stock for all corporations so formed shall not exceed in the aggregate the appropriation of $50,000,000, made by section 6 hereof. Said appropriation, or any part thereof, may be used by the President in subscribing on behalf of the United States, through such person or persons as he may designate, to the capital stock of such corporation or corporations, and the capital and assets of any such corporation or corporations, together with all additions thereto under sections 2 and 3 hereof, may be used in carrying out the objects of this act. The directorate and organization of such corporation or corporations shall be such as the President may prescribe, and such corporation or corporations shall have all such charter powers as may be deemed necessary or desirable by the President to enable it or them to accomplish the objects of this act. The capital stock of any such corporation or corporations shall be held and voted for the exclusive benefit of the United States, through such person or persons as the President may designate.

"SEC. 10. Upon the proclamation of peace the President shall proceed as rapidly as possible to wind up and terminate all transactions under this act, and to dispose as fast as practicable of all property acquired thereunder, and after said proclamation of peace no contracts shall be made, property acquired, or other transaction performed under this act except such as shall be necessary for the purpose of this section and incidental thereto, and two years after such proclamation of peace this act shall cease to have effect and all powers conferred thereby shall end: Provided, That the termination of this act shall not prevent the subsequent collection of any moneys due the United States, nor shall it affect any act done or any right or obligation accrued or accruing or any suit or proceeding had or commenced before such termination, but all such collections, rights, obligations, suits, and proceedings shall continue as if this act had not terminated, and any offense committed or liability incurred prior thereto shall be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same punishment and effect as if this act had not terminated.

"SEC. 11. That employment under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any person from military service under the provisions of the selective draft law approved May 18, 1917, or any act amendatory thereto.

"SEC. 12. That if any action or provision of this act shall be declared invalid for any reason whatsoever such invalidity shall not be construed to affect the validity of any other section or provision hereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

M. D. FOSTER,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
M. M. GARLAND,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
T. J. WALSH,
MILES POINDEXTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendment of the Senate to H. R. 11259, providing for the control of ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, submit the following statement in explanation of the action taken by the conference committee, we respectfully submit the following report as to the action of the managers on the part of the House:

The Senate struck out all the House bill and agreed to an entire amendment providing much the same as the House bill but in different language.

The Senate amendment as to the ores, metals, and minerals to be included was the same as in the House, except the Senate struck out "sea salt" and inserted "sodium"; this includes all the compounds of sodium, of which sea salt is one.

The Senate amendment also accomplished the same purpose as the House bill by making it shorter in many of its provisions. The main difference between the House and Senate bills is the Senate authorized the President to form one or more corporations for the purpose of buying and selling these necessaries. This does not require the President to form these corporations, but only gives him the power to do so if he thinks best. The other important difference between the House and Senate was that in the House bill it provided for the fixing of minimum prices. The Senate would not agree to such a provision, and it was stricken out, but did provide that the Government may contract for these necessaries and at prices agreed upon; also that these necessaries can be requisitioned, bought, sold, and allocated.

Another important provision agreed to in conference is that it restores the amount to be appropriated as a revolving fund to buy and sell these necessaries. Fifty million dollars was provided in the House bill as reported out from the committee; this was reduced to $10,000,000 by the House. It is believed by the conferees that if the Government is to buy and sell these metals and minerals, the amount of $50,000,000 would not be too much. This appropriation of $50,000,000 is a revolving fund, and when the war closes this money goes back to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and can not be used for any other purposes.

An amendment agreed to by the conferees provides that during the war these necessary minerals must be sold for not less than cost of purchase or production, but it does not apply after the war closes as there may be some of these minerals still in the hands of the Government, and it might be advisable to sell them at less than cost in order to close up the business, and it might be economy to take less than cost rather than conduct the business indefinitely.

These are the main differences as pointed out between the two bills.

Your conferees believe that with these changes practically the same purpose is accomplished in the amendment as printed in the conference report as was provided in the House bill.

M. D. FOSTER,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
M. M. GARLAND,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House and went to the Senate, where the Senate struck out all of the House bill and proposed another bill, which was shorter, and while in many of its sections it has the same effect, yet in some respects there has been a radical change.

For instance, the Senate bill provides that this work shall be under the direction of the President. The House bill provided that it should be done under the Secretary of the Interior, and that the Bureau of Mines should act as the agent of the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the Senate bill also provides that the President may form one or more corporations——

Mr. MONDELL. Before the gentleman leaves that particular point, will he yield for one moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. While the House bill has been very radically modified in the respect that the gentleman has just mentioned, I assume that in any event operations under the law will be carried out through the Secretary of the Interior and through the Bureau of Mines under the Secretary?

Mr. FOSTER. I think and hope that will be the case.

Mr. MONDELL. Unless these corporations which the gentleman proposes to discuss shall take the work over?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. In that case there would be some one in charge of the corporation under which the law would be administered.

Mr. MONDELL. It would seem logical and proper, however, that these operations should be carried on through the Interior Department and the Bureau of Mines in the main, would it not?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. That would be my judgment. Yet I could not answer as to what the President would do.

Mr. MONDELL. Nothing has developed to indicate any opposition anywhere to the conduct of these operations and the administration of this law by the Secretary of the Interior and the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Everything indicates that that would be done. I think under the Overman Act it is possible for the President to do that anyhow. Congress has given him the power in reference to these matters, and then it is provided that if the President desires to do so and thinks best he can place this work under some other department.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, when I interrupted him, was about to discuss the question of these corporations. What was the argument presented to the conferees indicating the advisability of having such corporations?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the President insisted very strongly that in the administration of this law it might be necessary to form these corporations—not that he was going to do it, but that if he thought it necessary to do so he should be given that power. And for that reason it was put in in the Senate, under the belief that there might come a time when it would be necessary to form these corporations, one or more, and have them transact the business of such buying and selling as might be necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill as it left the House carried $10,000,000. The conferees agreed upon an appropriation of $50,000,000. That is quite a considerable boost, even in these days of large expenditures.

Mr. FOSTER. It is. I will say to the gentleman that when the House committee considered this bill they were convinced that the law could not properly be administered under it unless they had sufficient money. This is a revolving fund, you will understand, which can not be used for any purpose except to buy and sell these necessaries. The amount was reduced in the House to $10,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it authorize the development of new mines?

Mr. FOSTER. It authorizes the development of mines now undeveloped or insufficiently developed.

Mr. MADDEN. So that this could be used for wildcat investigations?

Mr. FOSTER. No. If there is an undeveloped mine and they know there is a substance there that the Government could get and needs, it could be developed. It was thought best that that should be done.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the provisions of the bill, as the conferees agreed upon it, an operation could be undertaken which would be in the nature of developing an entirely undeveloped property?

Mr. FOSTER. An undeveloped property.

Mr. MONDELL. If property was found that was not opened up it could be opened and developed.

Mr. FOSTER. And the committees, both of the Senate and the House, believe that they should have the right if there was a mineral in a mine that was not developed to develop it and get it out for use in time of war.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any provision that requires a corporation that may be organized to ascertain before any money is invested in land that the mineral they seek may be found there?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is not in the bill, but it is to be taken that the Government would not go out wildcatting. It is only those mines where it is known that there are minerals necessary for war purposes. We have to leave some latitude, and we could not say how much or how little.

Mr. MADDEN. There should be a certainty that certain minerals are to be found in the locality.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but no sane man would go out and undertake to prospect for minerals under this bill. For instance, it has been said, I do not know whether there is anything in it or not, that there is a tin mine undeveloped, an abandoned one, and they might want to investigate it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have had one little misgiving in regard to this bill, and that is the possibility that the public might be taken in or deceived by promoters in the sale of stock. I understand that the Government under this law will take the products of various mines opened under the provisions of this law at a price that will guarantee mine operators the cost, at least, of the operation.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the guarantee price is out of the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is there anything in the bill that will prevent a corporation composed of men who have been given a contract by the Federal Government to open up a mine to then come out to the public and say this particular project has the approval of the Government and therefore if you buy stock in this mine you can not lose? Is there any protection against that fraud on the public?

Mr. FOSTER. No; but there is a law against it on the statute books now. A man may go out and say, "Here is mineral from a mine that the Government is buying and we want you to invest in this stock," and there is nothing in the bill to prevent it. If a man is gullible enough, if the gentleman feels that it might come to his constituents, there is nothing to prevent people from being gulled.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit, I have no sympathy with the individual who will permit another individual on the same level taking him in and selling him a gold brick; in other words, I am not in favor of having men put under guardianship, but there is a vast difference between that proposition and having some one come to you and say that the President of the United States, or the Government of the United States, is behind this, and the innocent purchaser might rely on that, and I think he ought to be protected.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be a fraud.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is there anything in the bill to take care of it?

Mr. FOSTER. No; but there are laws on the statute books to punish that sort of a fraud; that would be the same as any fraud.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is there anything in the bill as reported that would provide any punishment of those who would perpetrate that fraud?

Mr. FOSTER. No; and the committee did not feel that they ought to go into that phase of the situation, and I do not think the committee could.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. As I remember, the original bill reported by the House committee provided for a fund of $50,000,000 as a revolving fund.

Mr. FOSTER. The original bill provided for $50,000,000, and the House reduced it to $10,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. And after a somewhat elaborate discussion in the House that amount was reduced to $10,000,000, the House believing that $50,000,000 was an unnecessary amount. Now, in this bill as it is amended and agreed to by the conferees the original amount of $50,000,000 is reinserted.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true. In the committee on the part of the other body which has to do with this bill, after exhaustive hearings which continued for a long time, it was shown to be necessary to have this amount of money to carry on this work and buy and sell. The gentleman realizes that they must have a large quantity of material if they allocate it among these different industries and concerns throughout the country. It was believed by the committee of the House that they would need that amount of money. This is a revolving fund that can not be used for any other purpose, and after the work is completed all the money must go back into the Treasury. None of these minerals can be sold during the war time at less than cost—for less than it takes to produce or purchase them.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but it takes so much more taxes, so many more liberty bonds, to produce the $50,000,000 than it would the $10,000,000. I remember very well that the matter was all gone over in the House as to what would be needed and why it could not be used and why it was not necessary to use $50,000,000 as a revolving fund. And the House came to the conclusion almost unanimously that it ought to be reduced.

Mr. FOSTER. The House reduced it to $10,000,000, but after further consideration and hearings by the Senate committee it was deemed inadvisable to have a less sum than $50,000,000. As I have said before, this can not be used except for one purpose, and then it must go back into the Treasury.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course we in the House do not know the additional facts and statements that were made to the Senate and the conferees, but the gentleman knew what the feeling of the House was, and I sincerely hope that the reasons were strong enough to justify the House conferees in receding from the action of the House in regard to that matter.

Mr. FOSTER. The House conferees took into consideration the reasons set forth by the Senate hearings for the $50,000,000. The Senate hearings contained the statements of those who will administer the law and those who will have charge of it, and they deemed it necessary to have this amount of money; they said they could not get along without it. The gentleman will understand that in buying the necessary minerals it will take a large amount of money. Take into consideration manganese, which will amount to millions of dollars; chrome, which will amount to a lot of money.

You take tungsten and all the other metals provided for in this bill. If the Government controls them it will require a large sum of money. For instance, take sulphur. Sulphur is now at a high price, but the Government must have it and in order to get sufficient sulphur and to buy it, it will require a great deal of money to do it.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course we realize that, but $10,000,000 for that purpose is a good deal of money. The Government does not hold its purchases, it only purchases from time to time and immediately disposes of what is purchased, as the gentleman says, to equitably distribute and prevent monopolization.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a provision in this bill for storage.

Mr. TOWNER. But the storage probably would be a very temporary thing, and in most of the cases it would not be stored at all.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not know how much will be stored.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another thing. The language of this bill does not prevent wildcatting, as I read it, because it allows the President to take over at any time—and, of course, the President takes these things over upon the advice of somebody else—it allows him to take over undeveloped land or deposits or mines and to develop them and operate them. Certainly if undeveloped land is taken over it must be taken over upon the supposition, upon the representation, that it contains ores. As I understand the gentleman, when he first was making the explanation, money was only to be used for further development of lands that had been already opened up——

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand it, that is not the case because here the provision is for the development of undeveloped land.

Mr. FOSTER. This was thoroughly discussed in the House when the bill passed. This is not a new provision.

Mr. TOWNER. I know; but the House is very much more loath to allow $50,000,000 to be expended in development of undeveloped land for the discovery of unknown minerals for the purpose of locating them than it would be $10,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. This provision, I will say to the gentleman, might be abused; it is the same with everything; we have to trust somebody. Now, if it should be necessary in some undeveloped land in which it is known there is necessary mineral or metal for the prosecution of this war and the man who may own that land does not develop it and will not deevlop it, the Government ought to have the right to take that mineral if it is necessary to go there and get it out of the ground.

Mr. TOWNER. I think we would have the right to do it now.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. I will. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied 20 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we all realize that this may be properly classed as extraordinary, even dangerous, legislation. We are granting very wide and very broad powers to the President. We are proposing the entry of the Federal Government into the operation or regulation of a wide variety of private enterprises. We are only justified in granting those powers and embarking on these enterprises on the theory that it is absolutely essential to the conduct and successful and vigorous prosecution of the war. The House passed the bill on that theory. Whatever may be our individual opinions in regard to it, the administration is of the opinion that legislation of this character is essential. In my opinion there is very considerable ground for that view, though I realize that much depends upon the wisdom with which the law is administered. Tremendous abuses may grow out of this kind of legislation, much favoritism may result, large losses may result to the Federal Government, but it seems essential that we should take those chances in view of the opinion of those who are responsible and ought to be qualified to speak that the action proposed is necessary. Now, with regard to the matter of developing comparatively new property, it is true that losses might result from such development. Such development might be unwisely undertaken, but this is also true, that a considerable number of the metals mentioned in this bill have been developed and produced to a very limited extent in our country. The existence of deposits of some of those minerals or deposits of substances from which they can be extracted is no doubt known, and I have no doubt it may be necessary for the Government to encourage and aid in the development of what is practically undeveloped property or property that has simply been prospected to a point that the presence of mineral has been proved. If care is exercised in that respect there ought to be no serious losses, and much good may result from it in furnishing the minerals as they are needed at the present time and in bringing about a very helpful development for the future. Now, with regard to the increase of the appropriation from $10,000,000 to $50,000,000, I think the House was, after careful consideration, convinced that a smaller sum than $50,000,000 would be adequate. I am rather inclined to the opinion it will not be necessary to spend anything like $50,000,000 in the administration of this measure. I hope it will not be. I think it should be conservatively administered. I am not disposed to criticize the conferees for agreeing to the larger sum, and yet it is a very wide departure from the expressed view of the House. We can only approve the measure in the hope that conservatism—a conservatism that has been absent, I regret to say, in some other operations—will govern and control in the execution of this law. It can, no doubt, be made useful and helpful—we trust it will be—to the end that we shall secure the benefits of increased production of these minerals without entailing great losses on the Treasury or improperly interfering with orderly development with private capital.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. From the knowledge the gentleman might have of this whole situation, is it his opinion that this additional $40,000,000 should be allowed?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, my personal opinion is that it is very doubtful whether so large a sum of money would be necessary for all of the legitimate purposes of the legislation; however, we must resolve our doubts in this matter, as we have resolved all of our doubts since we began this war, in favor of the judgment of the men who are responsible.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the gentleman believe that if we were to appropriate $10,000,000 and they would come back later and demonstrate they actually needed more money they could get it?

Mr. MONDELL. Personally, I think that would be the very much better plan, namely, to have appropriated $10,000,000, and then have provided for a limit within which appropriations could be made as needed. That would appear to be a more business-like arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill and the conference report which follows the Senate bill are far more conservative in the interests of the Government than the bill as it passed the House. The bill as presented by the House carried as its fundamental principle the feature of guaranteeing the price of the products of all these mines. No person with a knowledge of mining but would know that in order to develop new mines with a high price to be guaranteed that would encourage development as the House bill provided, for two years after the end of the war, that it would result in large and untold profits to the owners of the present developed mines, which would have to be borne ultimately by the taxpayers of the country. There is a question in my mind whether this bill will ever be of any direct value to the Government in winning the war, especially if the war terminates within one year, because the agencies provided for in this bill will not have any effect whatsoever in developing these mines until nearly a year hence. The mere question of the amount is not so vital, if it is necessary, as is the principle. The House bill was vicious in providing a guaranteed price on these certain metals regardless of the cost of production, and having the guaranteed price fixed on that character of ore, which was necessary to further develop the ores of this country so as to develop a supply that was necessary in this country.

I question the policy of those back of this bill, and particularly those connected with the Geological Survey, who wish to develop their powers by going about the country exploiting mines. It was shown in the report that many of these metals could be obtained at much less cost from Canada, but that these prospectors in Government employ wish to develop mines in this country so as to obtain the exclusive supply from the United States. I have never believed in the idea of home-market production, of developing mines that are so inferior that it would impose a tremendous cost upon the consumer, when those same metals could be obtained from near-by countries at a cost considerably less. And yet that is the very logic of the advocates of these geological prospectors who are supporting this bill.

As I said at the outset, the Senate bill is far superior and much more conservative than the House bill. The conference report, which is submitted for our consideration, is more conservative than the Senate bill. It safeguards the interests of the Government in several particulars. If we are to launch upon this policy of providing funds to a corporation of $50,000,000, to build railroads, extend them into unknown parts, to develop mines for the production of minerals of which we know we will not have any available supply for more than a year hence, merely to shut off the supply from Canada and Mexico or from Brazil, why, then, this bill is much better than the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I could not subscribe to the vicious principle in the House bill that would guarantee a price that would levy a tremendous burden upon the consuming public of this country and which would bring millions of profits for the duration of the war and for two years thereafter to all the present owners of developed mines, where they happen to have a good proposition. And therefore I voted against it and spoke against it.

This bill is conservative, as I said, leaving it to the President and taking it out of the realm of the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who would be really the head of the Bureau of Mines, and throwing upon the President the full responsibility of determining, by any agencies he may see fit to determine, what mines are really necessary to be developed.

As I said before, if the war should end within a year I question whether any value will come from this bill, but if it does not end in that time, then perchance there may be some few instances where the Government in this time of stress and strain may receive some few minerals that will be of value to the Government in its activities.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois some questions.

Mr. FOSTER. I will be glad to answer them.

Mr. WALSH. The bill as it passed the House provided that the provisions of the act should cease to be in effect six months after the war was over?

Mr. FOSTER. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Now, the measure as now presented extends that time two years?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Under the House bill they had two years in which to close up the business, which is provided in this bill, but in six months the operations under that act should cease. They could not buy any more of these necessaries then. So the conference committee agreed on a provision which said that on the proclamation of the President as to when the war shall have closed. That is the difference. So the time that the conferees agreed to is shorter than either of the others.

Mr. WALSH. But the time is extended to two years within which——

Mr. FOSTER. To close up the business.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Matters shall be closed.

Mr. FOSTER. They realized there might be some things to be done to close up the business. We put in this important provision which says that during the war they could not sell these necessaries for less than production; but when the war shall have closed they do not have to do so. That only applies during the war, because the Government might have some of these minerals on hand, and it would be more economical to close it up and take a loss than it would be to continue the business. And so that is provided.

Mr. WALSH. Now, then, this language is used in one or two sections of this act, namely, "When the objects of this act have been accomplished." Now when will the objects of this act be accomplished?

Mr. FOSTER. The objects of this will be final when the money for whatever may be left on hand when the war closes is finally returned to the Treasury. That would be the final act.

Mr. WALSH. But the money is not to be returned to the Treasury until the objects of the act have been accomplished.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, that means as they get the money they would turn it back into the Treasury. It says "as received."

Mr. WALSH. No. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Section 3 provides, "Money as received shall be used as a revolving fund." That is on the top of page 3 of the conference report. And further: "Any balance of such moneys remaining when the objects of this act shall have been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. FOSTER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to section 6. It is provided there that "Any balance of said revolving fund remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. WALSH. It says "Any money received after the objects of the act shall have been accomplished."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and it says "as collected."

Mr. WALSH. That is rather unusual language, and that is what prompted my question. I would like to ask the gentleman one or two other questions.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. In the original House bill the President was required to cause a detailed report to be made to Congress on the first day of each regular session. That has been eliminated.

Mr. FOSTER. No. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It reads:

Provided further, That a detailed report of all operations under this act, including all receipts and disbursements, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month, covering the preceding month's operations.

Mr. WALSH. That is a financial report. This other report, required in the House bill, was to contain a statement of all persons employed, the salary or compensation allowed each, the aggregate amount of the different kinds of property purchased, a statement of all receipts and expenditures, and the general character and estimated value of the property on hand. Now, under this provision we do not get any information of that nature—under the provision put into the bill by the Senate or the conferees.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that Congress could get that information at any time it is called for.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and it could get the information required at any time Congress called for it. But it is in there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman let me make an inquiry in that connection?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from Illinois tell me why they eliminated the restriction in the House bill leaving the limitation on the maximum salary that could be paid to any person over $4,500 and for clerical services over $1,800?

Mr. FOSTER. The Senate insisted that it should provide for like service as is now provided by law. It has been said that in some cases—in the case of a technical man, for example—it might be necessary to pay a higher salary. That might occur only in rare instances.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course when you are going to form a $50,000,000 corporation we all agree you might not be able to find the right kind of a man for perhaps $4,500, or a highly accomplished scientific man for $4,500.

Mr. FOSTER. It is to secure the services of some technical man. That is the reason.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the gentleman if the provision which was the subject of the motion to recommit, to strike out the price-fixing power, and which came within 6 votes of carrying, has been eliminated by the conferees?

Mr. FOSTER. It has.

Mr. WALSH. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I notice that this measure passed the House on the 30th day of April, at which time the distinguished chairman of the committee presented at length the great emergency that was confronting us, the great need of securing control and a supply of these various minerals. Have the operations of the Government in the manufacture of war materials been at all delayed or obstructed or hindered by the delay in the passage of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether they have been obstructed or delayed, but there has been a very serious shortage, which it was thought would cause serious trouble—a shortage in some of these minerals.

Mr. WALSH. The shortage at that time was a shortage in shipping.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it was, as I stated at the time. It was the intention of the Shipping Board to gradually reduce the ships for this purpose until August, when it would be reduced to 10 per cent, so that there would not be the trouble that there is now. Now, there is only 10 per cent of the former tonnage available.

Mr. WALSH. One question more.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. The provisions of section 9 would permit one or more corporations to be formed and the entire stock of the corporation to be placed in the hands of Mr. Baruch or any of these other mining gentlemen who appeared before the committee, would it not?

Mr. FOSTER. Whoever the President might designate. It is in the hands of the President.

Mr. WALSH. I say, he might place it in the hands of one person. I did not ask what he could do, but I said it was possible.

Mr. FOSTER. I take it that the President would use his best judgment and select some one who in his judgment was capable of administering the law in the interest of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. The business of this corporation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. In the organization of the corporation or corporations is it intended that these corporations should be formed and the public be given an opportunity, or invited, to subscribe for a portion of the stock?

Mr. FOSTER. No. The Government would own the controlling interest and the controlling part of the corporation. Probably there will be no stock taken outside of what the Government has.

Mr. KREIDER. There will be none outside?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not imagine there will be. I doubt very much if there would be. But the Government always would have the control of it. Of course, after the war closes, under this bill there might be some loss, for the reason that it might be cheaper to close up the business and get out of it than it would to continue it and hold this for a longer time.

Mr. KREIDER. Do I understand that it is the intent of the framers of this bill that these corporations should be organized in the several States, where they would find the mineral deposits, under the laws of the States?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not know that that would be the case. It might be that they would form one corporation and take out a charter in one particular State.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. And do business as a corporation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; do business as a corporation throughout the United States.

Mr. KREIDER. In the development of these mineral deposits throughout the country frequently mines are opened which prove to be extremely valuable. It might be possible that under these corporations mines would be opened, and, as I understand, the corporations would cease to do business within two years after the expiration of the war, a specified period. What method, if any, is to be pursued in disposing of the property?

Mr. FOSTER. The bill provides that the President might sell the property and turn the money into the Treasury. No contracts can be made after the proclamation at the close of the war. As to that, whatever business there may be that can not be closed up right away will be continued. For instance, there might be a suit that would be continued for some time, but the property would be sold and the money turned into the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand from the report, the Government is to withdraw from the business within two years after the close of the war, and it will have to sell and dispose of its storage facilities and the property and everything under the authority of this act.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is really more restrictive than the House bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senate had a provision making it six months, but the conferees concluded that when the proclamation at the close of the war came the President should be authorized to dispose of the property and it should be closed up.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. NORTON. I take it that the administration of the law will be under the Bureau of Mines. Has the Bureau of Mines advised the Committee on Mines and Mining of their plan of carrying out this legislation?

Mr. FOSTER. It has not.

Mr. NORTON. You make a blanket appropriation to be worked out in the future?

Mr. FOSTER. No; but I do not know how else we could provide for it than we have in this bill.

Mr. NORTON. The department has not at this time any definite plan to increase the production of these minerals, has it?

Mr. FOSTER. The plan might be different in each particular mineral, but it would be to do what was necessary to encourage the supply that was short.

Mr. NORTON. I think that some investigation must have been made already to determine that there is a shortage.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; the department has done that.

Mr. NORTON. The committee understands that no plan has been thought out by the department as to how it will increase the production of these minerals.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know what the department has thought out; I am not advised as to that.

Mr. NORTON. Your committee was asked to enact this legislation without being given any idea as to how it should be carried out?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; we had extensive hearings in the House committee and also in the Senate committee on this bill.

Mr. NORTON. I have not read the hearings, but did it develop that it was the plan of the Bureau of Mines and Mining, which will have the legislation in charge, to take over mines and operate them?

Mr. FOSTER. If it was necessary to secure the minerals; yes.

Mr. NORTON. They have the authority to do it if it is necessary?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but they do not know that it will be necessary to take over any mines in the United States, and we hope it will not be.

Mr. NORTON. What is the idea as to the production of these minerals—to stimulate it?

Mr. FOSTER. In buying them at a price that will be profitable to those who mine them, and, possibly, if necessary, to go out and help do some research work, which it would have the right to do under the appropriation of $500,000. They might visit a miner and advise him the best way to get out the mineral.

Mr. NORTON. They would not want a fund of $50,000,000 to carry that out.

Mr. FOSTER. They could not use one cent of the $50,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. NORTON. What I have in mind is this: It seems to me that if the Bureau of Mines comes in here and asks for legislation of this kind, this really gigantic legislation, they ought to have in mind some definite plan, and ought to know with due definiteness how the production of minerals is to be increased, how it is to be stimulated, and how it is to be secured.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know as I can say anything more in reply to the gentleman as to these minerals than what I have said. Of course, of those minerals that they have plenty of they do not want to do anything. Those that they are short of they may want to go out and buy at a price that will encourage production.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. If they do not know and have no idea what they are going to do, how did the committee arrive at the conclusion that $10,000,000 was not enough money?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that the importations might be taken charge of, all that come into the country, and it will be necessary to allocate them. It might be necessary for the Government to do that for the prosecution of this war. All the foreign imports might be taken by the Government and would have to be paid for.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. And they want enough money on hand to do it, if necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. We thought so; and the department is very positive as to that.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I see, on pages 20 and 21 of the bill, an enumeration of the ores and metals. I think it is a fact that it is not possible under the terms of this bill to develop any mineral substance, ores, or metals, except those enumerated in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. That is right.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Does not the gentleman think it advisable to have a provision in the bill for the development of additional minerals that scientific demonstration may establish as useful?

Mr. FOSTER. The committee included all the metals and minerals that it thought was necessary to carry on the war.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Under any possibility.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and we have some in here that might not be necessary. We took in more than we thought was necessary as a precaution.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. The committee feels that it has all that were needed.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. We included all that we thought could possibly be needed by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In section 2 there is a provision in the last four lines as follows:

That such sales made during the war shall not be at a price less than the purchase or cost of production.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman want to know why that is there?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to make an inquiry with reference to the last part of it. Now, this amended act permits the Government to go into the business of producing any of these minerals. Suppose the Government should take over nine idle mines and it would produce these minerals at the cost, say, of $1 a unit. Suppose the tenth mine that is taken over the operation of the mine costs $2 a unit. Now, under the terms of this bill the Government would not be permitted to sell the product of the tenth mine at anything less than $2 a unit. Is that the construction which the gentleman gives to the act?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe they will take into consideration all the minerals produced. Possibly they might have one mine producing at the cost of $1 and another mine at the cost of $1.50, and so on. That might be, but after averaging all together if they find the cost is $2 they would sell for $2. We were fearful of this provision because we thought of it the same as the gentleman does, but we found many western people who are fearful that something might happen if the Government should be permitted to sell a certain material at a low price and put some mines out of business. That is the only reason that it is put in there so as to prevent that very fear, and we ran up against a serious proposition when we got to it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman can readily see if a private firm were compelled not to sell any of their production for less than cost of production it would greatly hamper the private firm, and it seems to me when the Government goes into the business of producing these minerals to say to the Government, "You can not sell the product for less than the production cost," would hamper them in the sale. In other words, these sales will be made to firms engaged in the manufacture of munitions, and, while they have a quasi public function, they are in reality private individuals and firms. Now, these firms will be the only market for the sale of these products, and if the Government is to be so hampered that it can not sell the product of any mine at a price less than the production cost, it seems to me it will mean they will have the production of these mines on hand.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Government is to produce some of these metals and minerals, the gentleman can readily see that the Government would not want to lose the money on them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I know they would not want to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. They were fearful throughout the West that the Government might get in competition with these private mines, and as a result of that competition they might put them out of business. They were insistent on this, and they absolutely refused to stand for anything less than this. We rewrote the provision from the original proposition, and they agreed to it, and they would not agree to anything else.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the language of the bill will bear the construction the gentleman mentioned a while ago, that you can take all of the cost of production and divide the price over all of the different mines, then that would not be so objectionable. It seems to me the language in the bill says that any such sales made during the war shall not be less than the price when they buy it or the cost of production when they produce it. That relates to the production of the mines owned by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. So it is, and that was the fear, that the Government might go in and be in competition with some mines and might put them out of business entirely.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That provision with regard to guaranty was stricken from the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the provision in reference to the prevention of waste was stricken from the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; stricken from the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the provision with reference to hoarding was stricken from the bill, and the control by the Government of distribution was stricken from the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; they have the right to requisition.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They can control the disposition by buying and selling?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But there is no power in this bill now to control the distribution?

Mr. FOSTER. No; that is one reason why they will need more money than under the original bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think there is no question that the way the bill is framed now there will be more money needed. In other words, as I gather from the reading of the bill, the purpose is to authorize the Government to go into the mining business in so far as undeveloped mines are concerned and go into the market and purchase for the purpose of increasing production?

Mr. FOSTER. That is right. We have not the right of control as was contained in the House bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The House bill had in mind the encouragement of private industry, and this bill has the provision for Government business.

Mr. FOSTER. That is it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In section 4 there is a provision that any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act shall upon conviction be fined not exceeding $5,000. What is the purpose of that provision?

Mr. FOSTER. The purpose of that is they might find some one whose product they have requisitioned, and he might refuse to comply with any order. Now, there ought to be some way of compelling him to do so.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What order does the President have the power to make under the terms of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. He can make an order to requisition the products of a mine or——

Mr. KREIDER. Or the mines themselves?

Mr. FOSTER. Or the mines themselves.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This being a criminal section of the law, before a man would be subject to punishment for a crime it must be definite. Does the gentleman think it is sufficiently definite?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman think that provision is sufficiently definite?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not a lawyer. I will state that on the conference committee there were some lawyers who have a reputation for learning in that profession, and they thought that this would be definite enough. That was their opinion.

It says:

That any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct the enforcement of or the compliance with any requisition or order, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation adopted hereunder, shall, upon conviction—

And so on.

There is on this committee a very eminent mining lawyer, Senator WALSH of Montana, who, I think, bears the reputation of being a first-class man in that respect.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And it was the opinion of the conferees that this was sufficiently definite?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It occured to me that it was not sufficiently definite for a criminal statute, and if there was some real remedy desired, it ought to be made more definite.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman have any information before him showing the production or the shortage or estimated shortage of ferrosilicon?

Mr. FOSTER. Whether there is a shortage or not?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman would read the statement and hearings I think he would get all this information.

Mr. NORTON. The statement?

Mr. FOSTER. If he would read the hearings. As to ferrosilicon, I do not know what the shortage is, if any.

Mr. NORTON. Or, generally, has the committee reported, or has there been submitted to the committee, figures showing the production or an estimated shortage of these various metals?

Mr. FOSTER. When the bill passed the House the committee filed all that, and it is in the RECORD—the uses, the shortage, and all about them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] put that in the RECORD.

Mr. WINGO. If my colleague will permit, I will direct the attention of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] to this fact. If he will go back and read the debate on this bill, which extended over several days, he will find that I filed a statement in detail in the RECORD on each one of these metals, showing production, source, and use of each.

Mr. NORTON. I thank the gentleman for that. It occurred to me that there are a number of minerals here of which there is a very large abundance at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true. You take sodium; salt is a compound, and of that there is an abundance, and the Government would not undertake to take control of salt; and yet sea salt is an important compound of sodium, which is imported into this country and which is very necessary to have.

Take, for instance, sulphur. There is an abundance of sulphur in this country, and yet there might come a time when you would want to do something with it. And it is put in here in order that we may control all these minerals, if necessary, that are needed to carry on this war.

Mr. JUUL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois concerning section 5, line 4. It reads:

That there shall be established such headquarters and offices for the administrative force authorized herein at such place or places west of the Missouri River as the President may deem proper.

Mr. FOSTER. That is out now.

Mr. JUUL. You say it is out now?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not in the bill.

Mr. JUUL. I was going to ask the gentleman what would be the object in excluding that piece of the United States lying north of the Missouri River from having offices?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is correct. The managers on the part of the House thought it ought not to go in the bill and the Senate agreed to strike it out.

Mr. JUUL. The fact of the matter is that on the Missouri River, from Williston, N. Dak., the territory extends far south, and it would keep that portion of the United States from having offices.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It seems to me a rather extraordinary authority is granted here. As I understand this bill, it authorizes the Government through its agents to take over under lease or on royalty, or in any other manner, a mining property which in the judgment of the officials is not being operated or has not been operated. Does this committee believe it should be so? That is an extraordinary power.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a wide power.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Many people own mining properties that have never been profitable to them, perhaps because of lack of capital or scarcity of labor which made it impossible to operate them, but they are wanting to do it and trying to do it, and if the Government finds that condition exists it proposes through its officials, if necessary, to take the property away from those people. Is that true?

Mr. FOSTER. For the prosecution of the war. A man might have valuable mines that contain necessary minerals for the prosecution of the war. This gives the Government the right and power to go there and get that mine and get those necessary minerals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Copper is one of the things.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not in this bill at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Copper is one of the things that the Government does require in time of war, and Germany would give her very soul for plenty of it right now. It is true the Government does not propose to take over the copper mines. But the Government has done this thing, which I think is entirely unfair: It has compelled the copper producers to sell their product under the market value.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the copper producers of the country have not lost any money, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, on the price that the Government has fixed for copper.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is not the question. I think the gentleman will admit that the producer of any useful commodity, produced in an honorable way, is entitled to the market value.

Mr. FOSTER. He is entitled to reasonable compensation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He is entitled to the market value, in my judgment. That is the way I view cotton, and my friend from Arkansas, Mr. WINGO, and my friend from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, no doubt, agree with me in that particular.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a question that we can not settle here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For some time copper has been quoted in London at £122 per ton, which figures out to be 30 cents a pound, as I make it, while producers in this country were compelled to sell their copper at 23½ cents a pound.

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The producers of copper have been given a price which they themselves know is highly remunerative. I have been protesting against allowing them more than they were entitled to if the English price was made the basis.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It was not fixed by themselves. They protested against the price. The English price, less freight, would be more profitable to the producers.

Mr. FOSTER. They may not be getting all they want, but they are getting all they ought to have.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think they are getting all they ought to have. I think they should get the market value.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was adopted was laid on the table.

READMISSION OF CERTAIN ALIENS (H. REP. NO. 812).

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has a rule on a matter that I wish to have taken up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not ask unanimous consent?

Mr. BURNETT. In order to save time I will do that. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the present consideration of House joint resolution 331.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 331.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 432 (H. Rep. 812).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of H. J. Res. 331, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces," under the general rules of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Kansas desire time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have had requests for 10 minutes. I would like to have about 10 minutes. I may not use all of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this resolution may be limited to 10 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and one-half by myself, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the debate on this rule be limited to 10 minutes, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas to use some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order House joint resolution No. 331, introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], providing for the readmission of aliens who are serving with the United States Army or with our allies. These men are those who have not perfected their citizenship and taken out their first papers, and under the statute as it now stands they could not be readmitted if they made application for reentrance into the United States in case they were maimed, blind, or wounded in any way. The resolution provides for the discussion of the House joint resolution, which it was the hope of the Committee on Rules would pass the House expeditiously.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There was no opposition in the committee to the resolution. It seemed fair to these aliens that they should be readmitted, having offered themselves, or having been conscripted in our Army, or conscripted by their own government to participate in the war on the side of our allies.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman in his time permit me to ask the gentleman from Alabama, in charge of the bill, whether in the consideration of the resolution opportunity will be offered to consider amendments?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know the provisions of the rule but——

Mr. STAFFORD. The resolution is to be considered under the rules of the House. It is within the power of the gentleman to move the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman yields for the purpose of offering an amendment, then he loses the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to debate this question in good faith. I wish to present an argument to the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That rests with the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. I would not be inclined to cut off any legitimate and bona fide amendment, such, I have no doubt, as the gentleman would make if he offered any; but I would like to have some kind of an agreement that at the end of an hour's time the previous question should be considered as ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no disposition on the part of anyone to delay the consideration of the resolution. I have given some consideration to this joint resolution, and I wish to present one phase of it to the House. I think it is worthy of consideration. I only want to have time and opportunity to present an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I think the matter can be adjusted. I ask unanimous consent that amendments may be offered at the end of the hour, and at the end of the hour it may be in order to vote on amendments under the rules of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have opportunity to discuss the amendment before the vote is taken. I understood from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] that the half hour under his control is already taken.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have 10 minutes at the end of the hour in which to present and discuss any amendment which he may wish to offer which shall be held to be in order by the Speaker, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has five minutes under his control.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from North Carolina is presenting a unanimous-consent request to the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from North Carolina was momentarily detained from the Chamber. I would like to yield five minutes that I have to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. POU. I will use that five minutes, Mr. Speaker, in asking unanimous consent that at the end of the hour the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] will have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may have 10 minutes to offer such amendments as may be held to be in order by the House, and at the end of that 10 minutes additional the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that in case the rule is adopted the debate on the bill shall run for one hour, under the control of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], at the end of which time the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may have 10 minutes in which to offer and discuss an amendment.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the rule.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 331.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

Resolved, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917, excluding from the United States aliens who are likely to become a public charge, or who are physically defective, or who are contract laborers, or who have come in consequence of advertisements for labor printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country, or who are assisted by others to come, or whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another or by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, or who are stowaways, or who are illiterate, aliens lawfully resident in the United States when heretofore or hereafter enlisted or conscripted for the military service of the United States or of any one of the nations cobelligerent of the United States in the present war; and aliens lawfully resident in the United States who have enlisted for service with Czecho-Slovak, Polish, or other independent forces attached to the United States Army or to the army of any one of the cobelligerents of the United States in the present war, who may during or within one year after the termination of the war apply for readmission to this country, after being honorably discharged or granted furlough abroad by the proper military authorities, or after being rejected on final examination in connection with their enlistment or conscription shall, within two years after the termination of the war, be readmitted; and that any alien of either of the foregoing descriptions who would otherwise be excluded under said section of the immigration act on the ground that he is idiotic, imbecile, feeble-minded, epileptic, insane, or has had one or more attacks of insanity, or on the ground that he is afflicted with constitutional psychopathic inferiority, tuberculosis, a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or mental defect, shall be readmitted if it is proved that the disability was acquired while the alien was serving in the military forces of the United States or of any one of the nations cobelligerent of the United States in the present war or in an independent force of the kind hereinbefore described, if such alien returns to a port of the United States within two years after the termination of the war; and that the head tax provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917, shall not be collected from aliens readmitted into the United States under the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reach some kind of an agreement so that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may not be precluded from offering his amendment. We have requests for time on this side, and I desire to divide the hour, one half to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], the ranking member, and the other half hour I ask to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois, Judge SABATH. I will state the purpose of the joint resolution. I am willing at the expiration of the hour to give the gentleman from Wisconsin 10 minutes in which to offer and discuss his amendment, if I may have 5 minutes in reply, and at the end of that time the previous question may be considered as ordered.

Mr. WALSH. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate may proceed for one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and at the end of that time the gentleman from Wisconsin may have 10 minutes to offer and discuss an amendment and the gentleman from Alabama shall have 5 minutes to reply.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I do not think the gentleman ought to try to make a unanimous-consent agreement here for the benefit of just one Member of the House. There may be other amendments that may be desired and the gentleman ought not to try to put this resolution through under an agreement that there can be only one amendment. Time is not pressing; we have the rest of the day, if necessary, to discuss amendments, and to simply permit the gentleman from Wisconsin to offer one amendment and discuss it for 10 minutes and then vote on the entire measure it seems to me ought not to be asked. It is not giving the opportunity that may be desired on the part of other gentlemen to offer amendments. I do not want to obstruct or delay the passage of this resolution, because I expect to support it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that it was his intention to give one-half of his time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and one-half of the time to be controlled on this side by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to an hour and a half, and to be divided in the way the gentleman suggests?

Mr. SIMS. I will object to that to start with.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say that I think that is the quickest way to dispose of it.

Mr. SIMS. But there are other bills to come up.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, and there are two more days in the week.

Mr. SIMS. The Rules Committee have brought in a rule.

Mr. WALSH. You will have to have a quorum here.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the chairman and the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that gentlemen on the other side are ready and willing to proceed with this resolution. It will take half an hour to call the roll of the House. Why not give this extra time to the resolution? In my opinion it will be the quickest way to dispose of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] this is the most expeditious way to get to his bill. We are all anxious to get to his bill.

Mr. WALSH. To get at it, the gentleman means. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I understood the request was to add an hour and a half to what had already been asked.

Mr. MONDELL. No; the request was that instead of an hour we have an hour and a half.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I misunderstood it; I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. WALSH objected.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate continue for one hour and a half, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and at the end of that time the previous question be ordered on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to one hour and a half, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not have to have that last part in the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object to the last part of it, because the gentleman has that under his control.

Mr. BURNETT. All right, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request as to the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the first part of the request that there be an hour and a half debate? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, indefinitely, on account of illness;

To Mr. LONDON, for the rest of the week; and

To Mr. TILLMAN, for three weeks, on account of liberty-loan speeches.

READMISSION OF CERTAIN ALIENS.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I only desire a little time to make a brief explanation of the resolution and then I shall ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

On the 29th of June of this year we passed the House joint resolution which provides for the readmission of lawfully resident aliens who enlisted in our armies, notwithstanding certain provisions that would exclude them under the general immigration law. In addition to that it was provided that lawfully resident aliens who joined the Czecho-Slovaks and Polish and other independent forces might also be readmitted. Those that joined the Czecho-Slovak forces must have filed a declaration of intention to become citizens. Since that time several treaties have been consummated and others are in process of consummation by which aliens of cobelligerent nations may be conscripted here if they do not elect to return to their own countries within a certain time after the ratification of those treaties. The President during the recess wrote to me, calling attention to some of the hardships and injustices of the act as it stood then, asking for an interview in regard to some changes that the State Department desired to propose. On my return I saw the President and had a consultation with him and also with representatives of the State Department, and a bill was prepared by the State and Labor Departments which added to the law we had already passed, those who joined cobelligerent forces, in order that those who returned to their countries and joined the forces of our cobelligerents might have the same right to return as those joining our own forces have. That provision was sent down as an amendment by the State Department and had no time limit for admission of the alien, and the bill as reported is not exactly as the State Department's bill, but it contains the principle that the State Department and the President insisted on. It simply puts those who join cobelligerent forces on the same footing as those who join our forces, and that is the principal change in the law that we passed on the 29th day of June.

The other modification is that it removes the obligation upon the Czecho-Slovak forces to have their first papers before having the privilege of readmission, but since that time the Czecho-Slovak people have become a recognized belligerent by this country it was thought by the committee that we should put them upon exactly the same footing with those who enlisted in our own Army. Another modification of the law that was discussed and agreed upon by the committee. Under the old law they must have applied for readmission within 12 months after the termination of the war. It was thought by the committee that our armies having increased so much, and are still increasing so much on the other side, that after the expiration of the war there would probably be a very serious congestion and that a good many good men, men who had made good soldiers, could not get back within one year for lack of transportation. Therefore that was amended so that the admission must be applied for within 12 months, but they might be actually admitted within two years. Now, that is the first part of it.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. JUUL. Now, what would be the objection to giving the soldiers out of this country the same length of time to apply that you give them to return? You give them one year to apply and they might be away up in northern Russia and away from transportation and have no means of reaching this country, no means for filing a request of any kind. Why not give the same length of time for applying as you do for returning? It could do no harm if they could prove they are entitled to return, and it might——

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will read the latter part of the bill, he will find those who have incurred any disabilities in the Army—that is, if they incur disabilities, wounds, diseases, incur tubercular troubles, or anything else of like kind—they do not have to make application within one year, but are given two years within which to apply for admission at the ports, and if they do so they can then be admitted. We greatly liberalize the admission of those who incur disabilities in the service. The original law provided that they had to make application and come in within 12 months. Now, in order to liberalize that we require of those who have not incurred disabilities in line of service to make their application within 12 months and be admitted within 12 months more, and those who have incurred disabilities are allowed two years' time for making application for readmission.

Mr. JUUL. Might not they be absolutely in inaccessible places, away from the mails, lying sick and absolutely be unable to comply with the 12 months' requirement——

Mr. MADDEN. They could apply to their commanding officer.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, yes; there will be liberal rules in regard to that. They can make application to our consular officers or make application to their commanding officers. We do not want to lay down any cast-iron rule as to whom application should be made or the form of the application. We want to make it as liberal as possible.

We thought, however, that those who had not incurred disability in line of service ought, by an application to return, show some desire to do so, and then have one year more to carry out that desire.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to the last section of the bill, which exempts from the immigration law the restriction of disability, of imbecility, insanity, or tuberculosis acquired by an alien while serving in cobelligerent forces. For instance, a Britisher who was residing in this country at any time during the war, and, as instanced by the representative of Great Britain to the United States in his letter to the Secretary of State, joins the Canadian or British forces and is disabled while in the performance of his duty with the forces of his native country, or in connection with the Canadian forces, and becomes afflicted with insanity, perhaps, or becomes idiotic, disabling him completely, yet under the provisions of this section you will impose upon the United States, just because at the time before his enlistment he was a resident of the United States, though a British subject, the burden of maintaining him here even though he was performing his full duty as a British subject with either the Canadian or the British forces. Is that an obligation of the United States where a British subject or any alien living in this country joins his native colors and becomes disabled in line of duty, and is this country of ours to be burdened with the obligation of supporting him and the foreign government relieved of its own obligation of supporting him and caring for its own citizen by reason of a disability incurred in line of duty in its own forces? Does the gentleman intend to place that obligation upon the United States? That certainly is what is done by this provision, and the amendment I propose to offer when I am given that privilege is to overcome that situation.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, that is the very purpose. There is no use to deny that. There will be very few instances of that kind; and surely, if we are engaged in a common world war for democracy, an alien should be readmitted who in good faith has acquired a bona fide residence here—is a legal resident of this country, if he elects—and I would rather they would go and join that way, and I think we ought to encourage them to elect to go and join their own forces instead of joining ours. For this reason, if for no other, that we absolve ourselves from granting him compensation and pension if he elects to go and join his own forces, I think there are other good reasons why we ought to encourage him to do it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like five minutes more.

Mr. SABATH. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, certainly, Mr. Speaker, if they are invited by the treaties to elect within 60 days to leave this country, their families perhaps being here, and join the cobelligerent forces and fight with our cobelligerents in the same cause, we ought to permit them to do so, and then, if they wish to do so, to place themselves in the same condition that they were as residents before they elected to go. And the obligation the gentleman refers to is the same obligation we assume in the admission of thousands of aliens already here and did before the war began as to public charges. If they are thought liable to become public charges they are inadmissible, but if they become public charges after a certain length of time, then our country takes care of them under the present immigration law.

And surely we ought not to say that where men have left this country, and possibly left their families, and have become afflicted or wounded on the other side in line of service, that they shall not come back merely because they are liable to become a public charge.

I think that is right, Mr. Speaker. Representatives of the State Department, as I have said, and of the Labor Department appeared before our committee and urged it, and you will find in the report that it is important in order to consummate and carry out the treaties in course of consummation and some that have already been consummated.

Mr. SABATH. If they joined our armies and became disabled they would be entitled to compensation or to pension?

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly.

Mr. SABATH. And by joining cobelligerent armies they are not entitled to any pension or any compensation from this country in case of disability?

Mr. KNUTSON. And we are relieved of just that much responsibility?

Mr. SABATH. And the fact is the country will be better off from a financial point of view.

Mr. BURNETT. We can take the chances on some of them being public charges on account of being relieved from the very trouble that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota have pointed out.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] may speak for 20 minutes and proceed out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I think we were going to discuss this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think it will be interesting for the Members of this House, also the public, to note that some 10 days ago the heads of the four great railway brotherhoods of the United States, speaking in behalf of the thousands of members of these organizations, filed a formal, ringing protest with the Director General of Railways. This protest demanded the abrogation of certain recent rulings of the Director General of Railways held by the representatives of the brotherhoods to be in contravention of the constitutional rights of members of these organizations, and of the principle of collective bargaining in which the administration has been engaged with such zeal in pressing upon private employers.

This protest first attacks the recent pronunciamento of the Director General of Railways which prohibits railway employees from taking a hand in politics, from serving as members or officers of political committees, or from holding appointive or elective offices. It is pointed out by the railway brotherhood heads that this ruling violates the most ordinary rights of citizens, and, indeed, inhibits on their part the performance of what is regarded by intelligent citizens of this Republic as their plain duty. It is set up in this protest by the officers of the railway brotherhoods that now that railway employees have been brought within the jurisdiction and control of officials politically chosen, it is more than ever their duty to take a hand in the selection of their servants in authority. It is not understood by the employees of the railways of this country why an administration which is having so much to say about the democratic control of industry should be so insistent upon prohibiting the employees of railways from taking the ordinary citizen's part in choosing the officials who are to make and enforce the laws that control these properties. They are also unable to understand why they should be prohibited from accepting designations as party organization officials, especially at this time, when the Secretary of War, with all his great responsibilities, seeks and accepts election as a member of the Democratic State committee in the State of Ohio, or why they should be estopped from actively participating in campaigns when no less than four members of the present Cabinet, by supposed inspiration from higher up, have written campaign letters indorsing the Tammany candidate for governor of New York, and that, too, in full knowledge of the fact that the present governor of that great State—Gov. Whitman—has given to the country one of the greatest exhibitions of loyalty that was ever witnessed in this country; in fact, in more than one instance has he invoked the law of the State of New York to protect our country and our Army against the insidious influence of citizens within the State, and has instituted prosecutions against this character of malefactors when the Government of the United States itself has refrained from instituting the same. And the employees of these railways do not understand why they should be prohibited from taking the smallest part in politics when the head of the Government himself is making a partisan public appeal in behalf of a Democratic candidate for United States Senator in the State of Kentucky, as he has done heretofore frequently in other States. That railway employees should be prohibited from sitting in municipal, State, or National legislative bodies is declared by the railway organizations in this protest to be an act of gross injustice.

In many railway centers railroad men are in the majority among the voters. That they should be a proscribed class as respects participation in their own local governmental affairs is unthinkable in a republic. Particularly does such an inhibition come with ill grace from public officials who are themselves in office by virtue of politics, and who even in this day of adjourned politics are in the political game up to their ears, as everyone realizes who possesses the most elementary knowledge of conditions and who exercises even the slightest observation.

Another ruling very vigorously protested against by the organized railway employees of the country is the order prohibiting railway men from participation in any business which comes in competition with that of patrons of the railway lines. In many localities railway men have formed cooperative organizations for the purpose of lessening the cost of living and relieving themselves from the exactions of the petty profiteers, who in this day of crusading against big business escape censure, possibly because of their superior voting strength. This cooperation under the recent ruling of Secretary McAdoo is prohibited. Many of these men have invested their savings in coal yards, garages, and many other local establishments. In this they are doing merely what citizens in other lines of employment are freely permitted to do. This is now prohibited, and railway men are required to dispose of their holdings in such business ventures and will be required to make heavy sacrifices in order to comply with the same.

If the private employers of labor were to attempt to establish such rulings and enforce them, they would encounter the fierce opposition of all employees, both organized and unorganized. They would also be opposed by the public in general, and some labor bureau, either in the State or Nation, would reach out its iron hand and smite the plutocrat who would thus dare to trample upon the constitutional prerogatives of free men. But that against which these railway chiefs protest most vigorously, as many who voted for the Adamson law two years ago were apprehensive would happen, is the refusal of the Railway Administration to recognize the principle of collective bargaining; that is, dealing with the representatives of the railway employees in settling wages and conditions. It is proposed by the Railway Administration to set up instead the arbitrary rule of a wage board of its own creation, upon which, the railway chiefs complain, the railway workers are not represented. What we are calling collective bargaining in industry at this time, it may be added, is not collective bargaining at all. There is no bargaining between the parties in interest. There is simply the arbitrary interference of an outside governmental agency, which tells both employer and employee what shall and what shall not be done. There have been instances in which strikes have been started by men who were later sent to arbitrate the very strikes they set in motion. The parties in interest have been left out of the situation, a thing tolerated only because of the exigencies of war, which has been too often employed as an excuse for anything and everything. But with this excuse removed, the existence of such a system would be unthinkable. Now, for the first time in this railway situation, labor is beginning to taste the bitter fruits from a tree of their own planting. By that legislation the rights of labor and the rights of capital were both overthrown, and it was decided that questions between them should be politically determined. In other words, if labor was in power, capital would be denied a voice; if capital should be in control, labor would be left out of the accounting. Labor leaders were warned at the time that this legislation meant the end of collective bargaining and the beginning of political settlement of industrial disputes, with the rights of capital denied now, perhaps the rights of labor denied next, and in both cases the injured party being refused an opportunity for a hearing in any properly organized court. As capital could be held to the employment of a certain individual, so that individual could be bound to his employment, and thus would be established the beginning of a new slavery rather than a new freedom.

This protest, couched in stronger and more indignant terms than I can suggest, was filed with the Director General of Railways week before last. Is it not remarkably strange that a matter of this importance has not reached the public? Is this a sample of the pitiless publicity to be expected under the new freedom? Mark the change that has occurred since the railway chiefs were received at the White House with such great pomp and éclat, and a pen provided for the head of each brotherhood, to be used in signing a wage act that was then claimed to represent the final triumph of labor over plutocracy, and which was going to usher in, as we were told, the bright and happy millennium of Government ownership.

The situation in which the railway employees find themselves does not differ materially from that prevailing in the Postal Service. There, an administration, which has seized the telephone and telegraph lines as an act of reprisal for refusing to recognize affiliated unionism, declines to accept the principle of collective bargaining it so benevolently imposes upon the private employer in total disregard of his wishes or his welfare. The administration of Postmaster General Burleson has been marked by a continuous battle between the organizations of employees and the department. The American Federation of Labor has twice adopted resolutions directing President Gompers to bring about a change in these conditions, but it has been discovered that Mr. Gompers is quite deaf in the ear into which any complaint against his administration associates is poured, and consequently nothing has been done. To this very department the telephone and telegraph lines, in coventry for their refusal to unionize their establishments, are turned over, and to-day the union telegraphers are more uncertain of their status than in the days of private ownership. A formal written demand by the postal employees upon the department to declare its attitude on the question of collective bargaining has been answered by an ambiguous argument which leaves the whole question in a cloud of uncertainty. This demand and decision, too, have in some way escaped the eyes of the once vigilant news gatherers of a free and untrammeled press. Rather do they prefer to chronicle the vainglorious boastings of the Director General of Railways as to the alleged benefits which are flowing to the people as a result of a 25 per cent increase in freight rates and a 50 per cent boost in passenger fares. Another thing that seems to have escaped the press is the decision of Federal Judge Evans, of Louisville, Ky., rendered a few days ago, in which it is held that the Secretary of the Treasury is acting in usurpation of authority in taking over the railways, because the law authorizes the Secretary of War only to do this thing purely as a war measure. Why is it that matters of such moment can not find a place in the public press of the country?

The wage earners of this country are discovering, and destined still further to discover, that the politician is not a better, a wiser, a safer, or a fairer employer than the man of affairs who has built up the business these politicians have seized and are now operating. When wageworkers were in the employ of the business man they had the Government to appeal to for a redress of grievances. Now that they are in the employ of the politician they discover that there is no appeal, there is no place to arbitrate, and the right to strike is denied. If they had been willing to listen to the advice of their real friends at the time they were demanding that their differences with their employers be politically settled, and had insisted upon making that settlement themselves, they would not now be confronted with their present embarrassment, an embarrassment that is destined to be intensified rather than mitigated as we progress further into the intricacies of political possession of industry.

In my opinion one of the greatest problems that the future has in store after this war is over, when it is tried to rearrange and reorganize the economic conditions of this country, will be to unscramble these scrambled eggs.

In the name of the thousands and thousands of patriotic, law-abiding, liberty-loving railroad men in my district in the State of Indiana and throughout the United States, and in the name of the thousands and thousands of equally patriotic but underpaid and overworked postal employees of the country, and in the name of the democracy that we are supposed to enjoy and for which we are now fighting to give to the world, I demand that these arbitrary and autocratic requirements of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General be abrogated and that the Government employees affected thereby be given the rights of citizenship to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri use some more time?

Mr. MEEKER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I was looking around the Chamber to see whether or not the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was present. He raised an objection to this resolution. I would like to call his attention, if he were here, to a couple of real live cases which I saw on the other side, which would perhaps make him change his mind as to whether it is necessary to offer any amendments to this resolution.

At base hospital No. 1, just outside of Paris, I saw a boy named Wilner, who had been less than three years in this country and had made his first declaration in order to become a citizen. He had had one foot amputated. I inquired of him what he intended to do after he had gotten his wooden foot, and his answer was, "I am not going back home until I get some more Boches."

On another occasion Gen. Edwards told me the story of a lad who had been about two years in this country, a tailor boy in Brooklyn, who had gone in and brought down several Boches, and when he was found his gun was jammed, the point of the bayonet was turned, and three dead Boches were lying at his side. Those boys had gone into the service, although aliens, when the country required men to serve, but they were full Americans in the full sense of the term.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They were serving in our armies?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes; they were serving in our armies. But the way our law stands to-day, unless this resolution goes through, those boys could not come back to the United States because they are technically aliens.

Only a few months ago we passed a bill here for the purpose of naturalizing a large number of men who had enlisted in the Army. At that time there were approximately 123,000 of them.

At the present time there are 260,000. We have naturalized in our camps here a large number, and there are thousands and thousands of these men with our forces who have not been naturalized yet on account of the fact that the machinery is not yet in full operation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. The men who are abroad in our forces are being naturalized now. Six weeks ago a committee was sent over, and they are actively engaged, and I suppose that one-half or three-fourths of those men have been naturalized by this time, as I am advised by the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. SIEGEL. Several gentlemen have asked me that question. But while the commission has started to perform its work, it will have to work for months and perhaps a year to spread out everywhere in France, because there is not a hamlet or a crossroads or a village in France where our boys will not be found hammering along on some part of the line. Let me add that the Naturalization Bureau is working as expeditiously as it is possible and doing all that it can with its limited means.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Regardless of the fact whether they are naturalized or not, they have done what every American ought to do—fight for the liberty we are trying to preserve?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MADDEN. And we ought to extend to them every privilege that is exercised and enjoyed by native Americans?

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman at the beginning of his remarks referred to a statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is not now present. I understand his query was in regard to men who were serving with our forces, whether it was equitable and proper that we should extend these privileges to men who may have been on our shores for only a short time and then returned to their native country and fought under their own banners.

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes. I think it is right and proper that those men should be readmitted, for this reason: Either we believe or do not believe that the allies are all fighting for the same common cause, for the principles of liberty and humanity and justice, which we are. If so, every man is fighting for the same cause, and we believe they all ought to receive the same treatment.

Mr. MONDELL. That was the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin. It is at least entitled to consideration, of course.

Mr. SIEGEL. We have endeavored in every possible way to get these men to enter the forces of their own country if they did not enlist in our forces.

Mr. BURNETT. Our treaty gives them 60 days in which to do it?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes. That was the purpose of the bill that the gentleman introduced, in asking these men to go into their own armies.

I am confident this resolution will pass. But leaving aside the question of this resolution, I may say that we are all interested in learning to-day that our soldier-Congressman, my colleague, in Italy, Mr. LAGUARDIA, has received the Italian War Cross for gallant services rendered the allied cause in Italy. [Applause.] And I may say that I saw him running one of these Caproni three-motor 650 horsepower machines near Milan, and that he had with him a force of young Americans training with him from all over the United States. And our friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. FARR, will be interested in knowing that two men from his city, Mr. Robinton and Mr. Lewis, although injured severely, insisted on going back and flying once more, after recovering from their wounds. [Applause.]

Now, there has been considerable comment made on the mail system in France, and if I had the time I would like to discuss it in great detail, as I know we are all deeply interested in getting news to and from the boys over there. I want to say this in brief: That I took that matter up most thoroughly and spent some hours with Col. Howe, and I find that a complete new system is being adopted over there and a postal regiment organized, consisting of men who had been in the Postal Service in the United States.

The only man who was not in the postal service was Col. Howe himself, and he came from Boston and is, as I am reliably informed, a prominent and successful business man who has practical ideas combined with military experience. The trouble has been—and we tested it, taking out about 200 different packages of mail that arrived in one day—that many letters are improperly addressed. We found 21 per cent of those letters had been wrongly addressed in the States. Whether there was a mistake in the War Department in organizing the same numbers for regiments of artillery and ambulance corps and sanitary trains and infantry organizations is not a matter that we can discuss now, as that condition can not be remedied. This is what occurs very frequently: A man will write John Jones or John Smith, Two hundred and eighth Regiment, American Expeditionary Force, France, without stating the branch of the service. You have Two hundred and eighth Infantry, Two hundred and eighth Artillery, Two hundred and eighth Ambulance Corps, Two hundred and eighth Sanitary Trains, and other kinds of units. Twenty-one per cent of these letters are wrongly addressed.

Another cause of trouble is mail has been received at only one place in France, but the new idea is to have it sent from the United States to four different ports instead of one, and they will be notified where the ship is bound, when the mail is going to be received, and where railroad trains must be provided and to be sent to these ports to receive the mail.

A further trouble is, that many boys in writing home have not given their correct addresses. We find some boys when they were at Tours, in France, writing home and saying that they were in Toul. Many letters arrived in Toul that did not belong there. Some of the boys desired to have their folks at home believe that they were in an active sector when, as a matter of fact, they were in practically no danger.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman explain why a person who is in active military service, stationed in Paris, detailed to the military paper published there known as the Stars and Stripes, should not receive a letter from this country addressed to him in care of the headquarters at Paris?

Mr. SIEGEL. I know that the gentleman is referring to his former secretary, Mr. James Britt. I saw and spoke to him there. The trouble may be that the gentleman put a 2-cent stamp instead of a 3-cent stamp on his letter. That has happened frequently.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have written a number of letters to boys across there and put no stamp on, and yet they have been received.

Mr. SIEGEL. That is true; but, as far as Mr. Britt is concerned, I know he has been getting a lot of letters lately.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming that the sender of a letter put on a 3-cent stamp, can the gentleman explain it?

Mr. SIEGEL. I have heard no complaint from the boys stationed in Paris, except in the cases of Mr. James Britt and another Army field clerk, who has not received any letters from his Representative.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman explain why letters sent by this same gentleman in Paris to this country should not be received?

Mr. SIEGEL. I can not explain it. I have received letters from that same gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that he has sent me six letters, and none of them have been received here, and I have sent him a dozen and he has not received them.

Mr. SIEGEL. It is true that some mail has been lost at sea. It has not amounted to much, but there has been some. Some Members' letters miss certain steamers. Under the new system various transports are to carry the mail.

The foreign branch in New York is to be notified by the military authorities when the transports are leaving, so that the mail can be taken on board. Last year, when Christmas packages were to go, at my suggestion the naval vessels carried the mails. It is hoped that they can carry mail this year, so that the boys may receive the Christmas packages in time. I may say that over 10,000 packages were found a few weeks ago in a warehouse, which had been sent out last year, in October or November, and had not been delivered. They were stored in this warehouse in Paris and had been lying there the entire time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. There are four ports in France where the mail will be received hereafter. At one particular and important port the great trouble has been that we lacked a lighter. As a result of a suggestion made on the other side a lighter is to be purchased, so that first-class mail will not be detained two days. Second-class mail will be sent to another port, where it can be more expeditiously handled. The two other ports where mail will be received are the proper ports for receiving first-class mail as well.

We have heard considerable complaint about the mail coming back here. I discovered "over there" some lieutenants who were politely taking their time in censoring the mails. I had a striking example of it. A letter was written on the 8th of August to me, addressed to my hotel in Paris, censored on the 16th, and reached me on the 23d. An order has been issued that all mail must be censored within 24 hours by these lieutenants who are censoring letters written by the men. That would account for a good deal of the delay in mail being sent over here.

On board the ship on which I came over we brought a little over 6,000,000 letters. In accordance with the suggestion made on the other side by some of the Members of the House as well as myself, who were over there at the time, letters for the West are now being put into directed mail bags so that when they arrive at our own ports the bags are immediately sent to the railroad depots and sent on their way. A better delivery is now going on and there is no reason in the world why mail from the other side can not reach people in the east of the United States in 16 or 17 days, and the Far West within 20 days.

The men on the other side are showing their faith in the justice of our cause. They are going into the fight with a spirit that shows they realize what we are fighting for. They are willingly making every sacrifice, and when I saw them going in with gas masks on, alert and singing, I saw before me cosmopolitan America, representative of all the nations of the world, going forward to fight the world's great battle for lasting freedom and justice. They have the right to look to America to give them quicker mail service, and to respond most generously in providing them with more cigarettes, chocolate, and athletic goods. They expect the people of this country to show them their faith in the cause, to oversubscribe the fourth liberty loan, and to show their love for their country by being willing to sacrifice all they possess in order that the fight may be won quickly and in a manner that will bring a complete victory. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, it is with keen regret that I have heard this afternoon on the floor of this House reference made to the fact that natives of Italy have come here solely for the purpose of earning money and then returning to that country with their gains. Such talk was frequently heard here about two years ago, and then facts and figures showed that the men from Italy were doing all that could possibly be expected from them, and that they worked conscientiously and very hard in order to obtain a livelihood. I called attention to that fact a number of times and directed the attention of this House to the large percentage of immigrants and immigrants' children who were attending our schools, high schools, colleges, and universities. Many of these remarks are made by men who have given no study to Italy, because a visitor to that country realizes at once that it is so wonderfully great in its treasures of art, so beautiful in its magnificent scenery, so full of the glories of nature that the man who only thinks of materialism and money can not grasp its value to the world at large. A country which has been praised so highly by Byron, Shelley, Sand, Landor, and Browning, possessing as it does all that stands for sweetness of song and music, is worthy of the deepest thought and consideration.

In a few years from now Italy will have awakened fully to the realization that it is bound to and should have a large share of the world's trade. It is going to turn from art, painting, music, and song to manufacture, mining, and commerce. It has twice saved the allies, and from Italy came Columbus and Marconi, the former discovering America and the latter giving us the wireless, both of which have been events which the people of all nations can never forget. Fighting on a battle front covering over 400 miles and losing a million men up to date, receiving less help than what it has asked for, yet continuing most faithful in every respect and in every way to the cause of the allies, Italy is bound to win the admiration of all thinking men and women who are not blinded by passion or prejudice. Every kind of courtesy which could possibly be extended to men was bestowed by the representatives and citizens of Italy to the Members of Congress who visited that country. The ties of friendship and good feeling which now exists between this country and Italy have been cemented more strongly than ever during the past year, and when the days of peace come we can look forward to one of the largest trades that ever went on between two nations and their citizens. Let us commence to look at what is best in a people and to recognize their value to the world at large instead of constantly harping on things which are of no value and which might in some slight degree tend to weaken the morale of our allies at a time when unity and harmony are so important factors in continuing the great successes which have attended our arms during the past two months under the most auspicious skies. It has truly been said by Edward Hale that there are some people who have three kinds of troubles, namely, all they ever had, all they have now, and all they expect to have. That applies most particularly to those gentlemen who can not realize the new change in conditions which confront us in the international sphere in which we have become the leaders.

Mr. Speaker, love of country is born with the individual. No greater love can man have, for he who loves his country showers upon her the same affection which he shows to his own mother at every opportunity. The greatest privilege which an American citizen has at the present time is to perform the full duties and obligations of such treasured citizenship. They imply a readiness and willingness to serve the Republic in every capacity he possesses. He exemplifies it by being willing to fight for her, physically, if he is able to do so, and financially at all times. He does not measure the amount of service he renders; he typifies by deed that which he would have his fellow Americans do; he believes in building up and not destroying; he demonstrates at every opportunity that to America he owes everything and that at her command he is prepared to surrender all that he has, whether life or treasure or both, in order that the country may win the struggle in which we are engaged. He knows full well that criticism of an ally at a time like this is bound to do harm, and he guards his remarks in order that what he says may be helpful criticism instead of a detriment.

Mr. Speaker, I hope to see every American citizen as a subscriber to the fourth liberty loan. The sooner we realize that where the treasure is there the heart is bound to be, the greater will be the interest taken by citizens in their Government and lead to closer study on their part of the problems which we are going to face when the economic reorganization and reconstruction period comes after this war shall have been won by us. A dawn of another day is coming, and then throughout the length and breadth of America we shall see a unified people, proud to be part of this great Republic, working for the common good of all men, standing at all times for liberty, justice, freedom, and humanity everywhere, leading the world in progressive reforms, arousing the nations of the world to the full realization of what real peace means, and that at all times demonstrate to all who may come here that this is a land of opportunity for those who, with the benefits of citizenship, are at all times prepared to carry with them the obligation to serve America in her hour of need. To that task we can all dedicate ourselves and pledge our children and their descendants to the same course.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, while the House joint resolution 255 was before the House it was amended so as to take care of the provision, and, as I believe, as far as it ought to be taken care of as now suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, wherein they struck out the last proviso of the bill, "that if any alien readmitted to the United States in pursuance of the term thereof shall at any time become a public charge the expense of maintenance and care shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States." Eliminating that, it left the bill absolutely equitable and relieved the party from that proviso, for under the laws of that State all would be treated and provided for equitably. The committee in reporting this joint resolution reenacts House joint resolution 255 so as to make it actually equitable and just, making no distinction of those who enter our Army and those who enter the army of the cobelligerents, but by extending the time in which they could make their application and extending the time in which they can be readmitted after the close of the war. The suggestion made that there should be a limitation here, an inhibition or a prohibition against those who enter the cobelligerent armies and a distinction between those who enter the armies of the United States, I can not believe is exactly right under the law as it now stands and under the treaties which we have finally consummated between England and the United States. Greece and undoubtedly Italy will follow in a short time. Is not that correct?

Mr. BURNETT. France has already agreed with us, but Italy has not.

Mr. RAKER. Italy has not, but will undoubtedly in a short time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the plenipotentiaries have agreed, but that the separate governments have not ratified the treaties.

Mr. RAKER. So they will all be the same. Now, the language is entirely different, because these men before could not be drafted. Those volunteering went into our own Army. Now they are given a certain length of time in which to designate the fact that they will enter the armies of their native country. If they do not, then they will be drafted in our Army and our citizens in the several countries will be drafted in the same way, so they will all have a place in the service—Americans in the armies of other countries and aliens in the armies of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. I notice about the middle of the second page of the resolution there is a provision as to certain aliens—

Who may during or within one year after the termination of the war apply for readmission to this country and shall, within two years after the termination of the war, be readmitted.

Is the purpose of the additional year to allow them to get over here? It would not be sufficient if the application date of one year should control——

Mr. RAKER. The purpose was if a man during the war at any time should make his application or he should make his application one year after the war, then he would have his two years within which to be admitted to the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. But does not he have to apply at a port of entry of the United States?

Mr. RAKER. Well, I do not think so.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it possible, in other words, for one of these men to apply while he is still in France or Italy?

Mr. RAKER. Now, that is the view of the committee, and we made it that way especially, so that a man could apply at any place and then his rights would not be affected.

Mr. ROGERS. But ordinarily I understand under the immigration laws the question of admission is not passed upon until the alien presents himself at a port of the United States?

Mr. RAKER. We believe this will permit the party to make his application at any place, and within the designated time in this bill he may come to this country and the department will make rules and regulations so as to carry it out, because the representatives of the various departments were before the committee and we discussed this very question. This resolution covers the entire field now, is equitable and just to all, and should, and no doubt will, soon be placed upon the statutes as one of the necessary war measures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in my absence from the Chamber at luncheon I am advised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL], a member of the committee, who was present when I directed an inquiry to the chairman of the committee, failed to understand my position and misrepresented it——

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite surprised that the gentleman did not understand what my position was in the query propounded to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. SIEGEL. Now, the gentleman himself has frankly stated that he was not present. I think he will find, if we had the stenographer's minutes as taken down, that he had not been misrepresented in any way.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was advised as I came into the Chamber by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that the gentleman from New York had misrepresented or misunderstood my position, and through the courtesy of the gentleman from Wyoming my position was set forth correctly. Now, since the gentleman from Alabama has presented the views of the committee as to allowing aliens who at the time of joining the forces of cobelligerents resided in the United States and have become disabled in the service of their native countries, I am not so strong in my position as to whether the amendment I had proposed to offer should be presented. I certainly wish to broaden the present law, so as to permit not only aliens of Czecho-Slovak countries who have declared their intention to become citizens and have joined those forces, but I wish to permit all aliens who have joined not only the military forces of the United States, but also the military forces of cobelligerents, to return to this country within a certain period of time and be exempt from the provisions of the contract-labor law and those other provisions which are carried in the first part of this bill, but I have serious doubt in my mind whether it is the duty of the United States Government to take upon itself the obligations of supporting for all time an alien who joins the cobelligerent forces and becomes disabled through imbecility or insanity and seeks to return to this country to be supported by it ever after.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What sort of support does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. STAFFORD. This last clause exempts men who have become idiotic, epileptic, or insane as a result of their services in their native forces, in the cobelligerent service, and permits their admission to this country if they resided here at the time of their enlistment in cobelligerent forces.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is that character of support that will necessarily be thrown upon the local municipalities. Take this instance, there can be no objection on the part of any alien who has never declared his intention whatsoever, who goes and joins his native forces, the cobelligerent forces, such as Italy or Great Britain, who, at the expiration of two years, wishes to return to this country, if he is free from such permanent taint.

There is no objection to that, whether he comes into this country with his passage paid or not, or because of any other objections that are waived in the first part of the bill. But take, for instance, this case: There have been hundreds and thousands of Italians without any claim to citizenship who, at the call of their native country, left this country and joined the Italian forces. If they are injured and become permanently disabled with imbecility or insanity and the like, then these foreigners under this bill are to be permitted to return to this country, and our Government maintain them as a public charge. I say that burden should be imposed upon their native country, and that is the phase I am presenting.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What remedy has the gentleman in mind to relieve that situation?

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to strike out, line 2, page 3, after the words "United States," "or of any one of the nations cobelligerent of the United States in the present war."

Mr. SABATH. That is the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg your pardon, that is not the present law. The present law does not permit an alien who has joined the native forces of his own country and who becomes disabled in line of duty in those native forces to return to this country.

Mr. BURNETT. He means you strike that out and leave the law substantially as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does an injustice to the resolution that he reports. He stated in his opening remarks that it comprises two features; that the first part enables aliens, regardless of whether they have declared their intention, which is the present law, to become privileged to come back to this country. The second provision relates to those who have become disabled through imbecility, insanity, or the like in line of duty to be returned to this country in spite of their disability. Am I not correct in that explanation of this bill?

Mr. RAKER. The words the gentleman suggests there comprise new legislation in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is. There is no question about that.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the reason for their leaving this country is the war, and if it was not for the war there would not have been any of these disabilities which the gentleman describes. Now, when they return disabled they return because they have performed services in some organization in which we are just as much interested as if it were our own organization.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; they performed a service that they owed in this great war to their native country, of which we are receiving the benefit. As an instance, thousands of Italians left this country before we became involved in war. They went to Italy in response to the call of their Government, and rightly so, to assist their native country in defense from an invasion by the enemy. After they have enlisted and become permanently disabled, or become insane, you are to permit their return and have the burden of support thrown upon this country, when they were only doing that which was directly in their line of duty. Why should the United States bear that burden?

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman, if it was not for the war, is it not a fact that they would have remained in this country and completed their citizenship and have been entitled to all the rights and privileges which this bill seeks to give them?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a question between the United States and the foreign governments. Upon whom is the obligation? Is the obligation upon the United States when a foreigner in this country goes and joins his native forces and is disabled in line of duty for this country to support him and take care of him? Carry this amendment to the logical extreme, and you would permit any alien, whether he has resided in this country or not, who had been injured and permanently disabled to come into this country and be supported by the United States Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman's position to be this: That inasmuch as we are not proposing to take over the care of the allied soldiers generally, we should make no different rule because, perchance, a man should have come here and resided here for a short time for the purpose of accumulating money and then returned home?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not only that, but there have been thousands of Canadians who have crossed the border for a temporary domicile and afterwards returned and joined the Canadian forces.

There have been Britons residing here who have joined the British forces. Suppose they are injured in the defense of their country and carrying out their duty as citizens of their own country, permanently disabled and insane, so that they will never be able to recover, are we to relieve the British Government while they are disabled in the performance of their duty in connection with their forces of the burden of supporting them for all time when there is no legal obligation upon this country for that support?

We are doing much, indeed. No one is raising any protest against allowing aliens who are not disabled and who had been residing here, and joined the cobelligerent forces, to come in here freely. We are going further than the resolution of last June, and rightly so. There is no objection to that phase. I think there is grave doubt as to our carrying the great obligation of injury to foreigners, injury received in line of duty in connection with their forces directly connected with their native country.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman give me a quarter of a minute?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does the gentleman realize there are thousands of men who have left the United States and who, instead of fighting with the nominal country, have been fighting with the allies against the country? For instance, the Poles under Austria and the Poles under Prussia can not go back to their own country.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me right there——

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. They will all be provided for in the first clause.

Mr. JUUL. But if the amendment which the gentleman proposed is agreed to, they will not be provided for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; they are provided for in this first provision. Any alien who enlists in the Czecho-Slovak organization or who enlists in the United States Army or in the army of the cobelligerents will be provided for.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the gentleman know that thousands of these Czecho-Slovaks, wishing to aid the cause of democracy, were obliged to join the French, the Italian, and the Russian forces, and to-day there are 25,000 Czechs in the French Army, and many in the Italian Army, and many in the British Army?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are all privileged to return to this country, as the first part of the provision provides, on condition, I am frank to admit, they are not permanently disabled. If they are permanently disabled, I am frank to admit that they will be excluded; but I shall change the form of my amendment so as to permit these special classes to be admitted even in case they have incurred disability in line of service. As their native country may exclude them, we should not raise a bar to their returning here, I agree.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to read an item from the Dallas News, as follows:

TEXAS HAS SENT 200,000 MEN INTO NATION'S SERVICE.

AUSTIN, TEX., September 21.

Texas has furnished approximately 200,000 men for the great American Army fighting for world freedom and peace. A total of 114,208 have been formally inducted into the Army through draft, of which 81,208 were white and 32,281 were negroes. Voluntary enlistments and inductions aggregated 42,452. The old Texas National Guard sent 15,000 soldiers and the new National Guard of Texas, about to be Federalized, will supply 16,000. This makes a grand total of 187,660 and does not include those who went into the Navy and with the marines. The latter two classes are expected to bring the total to 200,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, it might as well be admitted frankly that the purpose of this resolution is to enable the State Department to complete its negotiation of treaties with certain countries, Italy, for example, by which the services of citizens of that kingdom who are in this country may be secured by inducing them to go into the Army with the promise of the privilege of returning after the war.

Now, it has been explained already, but it may be well to explain it again to those Members who do not recall the resolution which passed some weeks ago, that this proposes to extend the privileges of readmission to this country to certain aliens who were lawfully residents here before the war who have not gone into our Army or into the army of the Czecho-Slovaks or other independent forces. The Secretary of State stated his position in reference to this matter in letters to various Members and to the chairman, who has clearly explained it all in a paragraph on page 2 of the report:

> Especially is that true since we have negotiated and are negotiating treaties with cobelligerent nations by which we may draft their subjects into our armies unless, within a specified time, they elect to return to their own countries.

And presumably to go into the military service, because they will be forced into it if they do not go into it voluntarily.

Now, if they went into our Army and were disabled, does any one doubt that we would pension them for that service when the war is over or provide for them in some way? But if they go into the Army of their own country we do not incur the obligation of pensioning them. We simply permit them to come back here, and we overlook perhaps certain physical defects in doing it. From the point of view of economy, for the saving of the money of the people, it is better for us to do this than to encourage them to go into our own Army and thus impose on ourselves the ultimate obligation of pensioning them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that if they do join our Army now, the very next day after joining they can take out citizenship papers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but we do not want to force people to become citizens.

Now, I want to comment for a moment on another argument advanced by the gentleman from Wisconsin a moment ago. He spoke of it as matter of disparagement when he said foreigners come over here and accumulate a little money and then go back to their own countries to live. I have no objection to that, and I do not see the force of the argument. If a man comes over here and gives his services to somebody for so much money, presumably it is a profitable transaction for the man who employs him as well as the man who has earned the money; and if the man who has earned the money wants to go back to Italy or to France, and if my friend from California [Mr. RAKER] were not here, I would say to China, I would be perfectly willing to let him do it, and it might be that I would be more willing that he should do that than that he should stay here. I think we can rely on our own people hereafter for population, and I am not willing to encourage all kinds of people from all parts of the world to come here. But if a man does come and renders good service for fair pay, he is entitled to go and spend his earnings wherever he pleases.

I hope the wishes of the State Department in this matter may be respected, and that we may relieve them from any embarrassment in negotiating treaties where it is alleged and truthfully alleged that there is discrimination against certain people. I hope there will be no vote against this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have, if I am not mistaken, 10 minutes left. After I have used 15 minutes, I would be glad if the Chair would call my attention to it. Before I proceed, however, I want to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the pending measure, but arose for the purpose of reading to the House an extract from a letter written by Lieut. Wendel Robertson to his mother. At the outbreak of the war this splendid young man, a resident of Fort Smith, Ark., enlisted for training as an aviator and has rapidly won recognition and distinction by his services. You will recall the death of Lieut. Dave Putnam, the American ace of aces, which occurred in action on the Lorraine front Wednesday, September 12. Lieut. Robertson and Lieut. Putnam were members of the same flying squadron and were together in the same air battle in which Putnam was killed, but Robertson was so fortunate as to come through the battle alive. On August 6 Lieut. Robertson wrote to his mother a letter, the extract from which I shall read. I was deeply moved by the heroic sentiments expressed and believe you will appreciate the noble spirit that breathes through this simple yet sublime message from a boy to his mother.

If anything does happen to me, and you know it is not impossible, I don't want you to feel too bad, for you see I want you to see things in this light.

I have up to now had a rather wonderful life. I have had everything given me and have given nothing in return. The life I am leading now is by far the most comfortable of any combatant in the war, so if it be so ordained that I die I will be merely paying my debt to the countless millions before me who have suffered for me, and if I do die it will be a wonderful end. The clean sport of the game right to the end.

I don't want you to be depressed by what I have written, for its simply the thing we have all faced since I have been in the Army. I have not written about it before, and I shan't again, but I do want you to feel about it as I do. Death is nothing to be feared if met in the midst of war. I don't visualize him as a grim specter riding a raging storm, but rather as a high priest who solemnly confers the black robe of immortality.

[Applause.]

That is the spirit, Mr. Speaker, of the boys over there. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, within a few days after the declaration of war by our country against Germany thousands of resident Bohemians (Czechs), Poles, Slovaks, Croatians, Jews, and Italians, who as yet had no chance or opportunity to be naturalized—and therefore were resident aliens—enlisted in our Army; a great number of them, desirous for immediate service abroad, crossed over to Canada to join the British-Canadian Army, and still others crossed the seas to join the French, Italian, Serbian, Greek, and Russian forces, their aim being to get across and on the firing line. The only fear they entertained was that they could not get over soon enough to fight against the German and Austrian despotism and for the cause of democracy. [Applause.]

Thousands upon thousands of these former resident aliens are now heroically fighting on all fronts in the French, British, Italian, Czecho-Slovak, and the Serbian Armies. [Applause.] Each and every one of these men a volunteer for this great and noble cause, and whenever we find men who are brave and courageous enough to offer to sacrifice their lives for a cause of righteousness, justice, humanity, and democracy for which we ourselves are fighting, they are surely entitled to consideration. Every one of them, it matters not of what nationality, are made of the right stuff and deserving of consideration and recognition we can extend them and surely entitled to the privileges which this resolution aims to grant them—the right to again enter upon our shores without being subjected to our strict immigration restriction laws. These men did not hesitate, they did not wait, but were ready, leaving their homes and many their dear ones to fight for freedom and liberty. True, many of them had a double reason, namely, to help their mother country and, secondly, to help their adopted country in its cause for world democracy, but they offered themselves for a noble cause, and their strength of character and bravery should not be questioned or impugned. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed deplorable that their motives should be questioned, that there should be any criticism of any of these brave men or objection against this meritorious resolution, and I sincerely hope, after due consideration on the part of the gentlemen who have seen fit to criticize, that they will reconsider and see the justice of this legislation. These men, including those who left before the declaration of war, have demonstrated by their action the proper spirit for the cause of freedom and liberty, and consequently those that survive, though they may have suffered disabilities in their service, which under normal conditions would preclude them from entering, are deserving and should be received by us with open arms.

Mr. Speaker, knowing how bravely they responded and under what conditions thousands of these men left the United States to join the cobelligerent forces, early in February of this year I introduced this resolution, but, unfortunately, notwithstanding my earnest plea and efforts for its adoption the committee believed that the time was not at hand for its passage, and refused to give it favorable consideration, but amended it to exclude those in the cobelligerent armies and in this mutilated form was reported and passed. But, Mr. Speaker, since that time the Department of Labor, as well as the Department of State, have earnestly recommended its passage as originally introduced, thereby bearing out my previous contention that this legislation should be enacted in behalf of these brave and deserving patriots.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. For a question.

Mr. JUUL. Is it not a fact that but for the passage of this resolution, or a similar one, any or all of these men who have left here can not come back if they have lost an arm or a leg or an eye?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is correct. They can not come back unless this resolution be adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it was trying for me at the last session and the beginning of this session to convince the majority of the membership of this House as to the Czecho-Slovak movement, many questioning my assertions and doubting that such a body as the Czecho-Slovak Army existed, and questioned the advisability of giving or granting them the recognition that I have so earnestly pleaded and strongly recommended. To-day no one questions the existence of this brave and determined army, of its bravery and heroism, and its superhuman accomplishments. [Applause.] It is well known not only to you but to the entire world. [Applause.] Yet even to-day and every day I am asked who are the Czecho-Slovaks, and therefore I shall avail myself of the opportunity to at least partially acquaint you and the country of who they are and for what they stand. The Czechs are the Bohemians. In the Bohemian language called Czechs.

Czecho-Slovaks are the Slavs of northwestern Austria-Hungary, consisting of two branches, namely, Czechs (Bohemians) and Slovaks. Czechs live in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia, which for years has been oppressed and misruled by Austria-Hungary. They number 7,000,000. Slovaks, 2,500,000 in number, inhabit Slovakia, in Hungary, which is everywhere contiguous with Moravia and Silesia.

These Czecho-Slovak lands measure 50,000 square miles, and have 12,500,000 inhabitants, of which 9,500,000 are Czecho-Slovaks. They have struggled against German and Magyar violence for 1,000 years. They were an independent State till the middle of the eighteenth century, when the Hapsburgs destroyed the last vestige of their independence. Czecho-Slovaks, however, never yielded, always insisting upon their rights. This war gave them the opportunity against Austria-Hungary that they have been waiting for. They are dying by the thousands for their liberty.

The men of military age fled from the Austrian Army to Russia, France, and Italy, where they organized independent Czecho-Slovak armies, which fight under the allied high command for the common cause of liberty and for the independence of the Czecho-Slovak State. They are marching through Siberia, forming the so-called eastern front, where they are engaged in a death struggle with the German and Magyar brutality and the bolshevik treason.

Czecho-Slovaks are giving their lives for their independence, for the great ideals of humanity, as proclaimed by President Wilson. [Applause.]

To better acquaint the American people with the Czechs (Bohemians) I will insert an article by Mr. Charles Pergler entitled "Should Austria-Hungary exist?" which not only gives a brief history of Bohemia and why it should be free, but also why Austria-Hungary—and I add Germany—should be overthrown, and in its place there should arise Czecho-Slov, Jugo-Slav, and United Free Poland, and other independent States:

SHOULD AUSTRIA-HUNGARY EXIST?

[By Charles Pergler.]

Metternich once called Italy a mere geographical expression. This statement was never really true of Italy, but it may be applied to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Who ever heard of anyone calling himself an Austrian? Even Francis Joseph, the late Austrian Emperor, once asserted that he was a German prince. There is no Austrian language, no Austrian literature, no Austrian nationality, no Austrian civilization. Still, States do not come into being without the aid of powerful social, economic, and political factors. Austria's main justification for existence may be found in Asiatic invasions; that is, of the Huns (Magyars) and later of the Turks. German Austria, Hungary, and Bohemia became a federation of independent States, bound together only by the person of a common king, for the purpose of more efficiently resisting Turkish pressure, when in 1526 the Hapsburgs were called to the Bohemian throne by the free choice of the Bohemian people and confirmed all the ancient rights and privileges of Bohemia.

One of the most important acts in the reign of Ferdinand the First, the first of the line of Hapsburg kings of Bohemia, was the destruction in 1547 of the autonomy of Bohemian cities, and the execution of the leaders in a movement for the establishment of liberty for all religious beliefs in Bohemia and the reestablishment of the elective character of the Bohemian crown, which Ferdinand abolished. After that, the history of Bohemia was largely a struggle between the Hapsburgs, aiming at Germanization and violating their oaths to maintain the independence of the Bohemian State, on the one hand, and the Bohemians, seeking to preserve their independence, on the other hand. The struggle culminated in a revolt signalized by the defenestration of Prague in 1618, when the representatives of Bohemian nobility threw from the window of the royal castle the representatives of the Hapsburg king. This incident was followed by the dethronement of the Hapsburg dynasty and the election of the Elector Palatine to Bohemian kingship. However, in the struggle which succeeded the act, the revolutionaries were defeated at the battle of White Mountain in 1620; but even then Bohemia was not completely derived of her independence, although her sovereignty was somewhat restricted by an edict of the king. Complete destruction of Bohemian independence came during the eighteenth century, especially during the reigns of Maria Theresa and her son Joseph, whose aim was to make of Austria a purely German State, and to destroy the identity of the various small nationalities comprising the empire.

Notwithstanding the policy of forcible Germanization, the rise of the spirit of nationality could not be prevented, and in 1848 not only did the Magyars demand self-government, but the Bohemians also came forward with a program asserting certain political rights. The abortive revolution was followed by a period of the most rigorous absolutism. But almost 20 years later it was realized that a policy of repression of all non-German nationalities was impossible. In 1867 the Magyars were granted independence, and the present dual monarchy came into existence.

There is no statute of limitations against the rights of nations; but Austria-Hungary can not even enter a plea of waiver against the Bohemian claims, because the Bohemians never ceased to protest against the existence of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in its present form, and never waived their rights to the restoration of their independence. The late Emperor Francis Joseph on two distinct occasions admitted these rights and promised to revive them. Especially after the defeat of France in 1870 by Prussia, he was inclined for a short time to follow a federalistic Slav policy.

On the 12th of September, 1871, in a solemn declaration addressed to the Bohemian Diet, he made the following promise: "Having in mind the political standing of the Bohemian crown and the glory and power it has given us and our ancestors, and realizing the faithful support always given our throne by the Bohemians, we gladly recognize the rights of this kingdom and are ready to renew this recognition by our coronation oath." But when Bismarck assured him that Prussia had no aggressive intentions toward Austria, he violated his promise to the Bohemians without that decent regard for the opinions of mankind which all gentlemen have. We know to-day that Bismarck's conciliatory attitude toward Austria was dictated by purely German interests and by his expectation of making Austria a Prussian tool for the conquest of the East, and especially for securing to Germany the heritage of the moribund empire of the Sultans.

Since the beginning of the modern constitutional era even Austria has been forced to assume a thin veneer of civilization, which consists in at least a semblance of parliamentary institutions and well-sounding constitutional provisions. Thus the nineteenth section of the constitution of Austria provides: "All races of the State enjoy equal rights, and every race has an inviolable right to assert its nationality and to cultivate its language; the equal rights of all languages in the country, in schools and public life, are recognized by the State." This provision is nothing but a grim jest. The Germans of Bohemia are in a decided minority, and yet they are the privileged nation. Moreover, in all the administrative offices of Bohemia the equal rights of the Czech language have never been recognized, and as regards school facilities the Czechs have always been discriminated against. In communities with German officials in the saddle it has been next to impossible to obtain adequate Czech schools, and frequently such schools as existed were maintained in quarters that were no better than stalls. The Germans of Austria have always treated the Czechs as inferiors, although they themselves do not equal them in culture, since in spite of being the favored nation they have about 6 per cent of illiterates, while the Czechs have only a little over 2 per cent. Even now 11,000,000 Germans in Austria have five universities, while 10,000,000 Czechs and Slovaks have but one university.

Conditions among the non-German nationalities in Austria were bad enough in times of peace. To-day, after three years of war, they beggar description. The meager right to use the Bohemian language in administrative offices in Bohemia has been abolished and German has been established as the official language (Staatssprache). On the railroads the humblest laborer can not obtain any position unless he has a command of the German language. The present minister of railroads, Dr. Foerster, has ordered that railroad officials, even among themselves, shall not use the Czech language, but must speak German. A conversation in Czech is treated as a gross breach of discipline.

When we come to the Hungarian part of Austria we meet a condition which, if anything, is still worse. For 3,000,000 Slovaks there does not exist in Hungary a single adequate Slovak school conducted in the Slovak language. Even before the war the Slovak press was systematically persecuted and Slovak papers were subjected to unimaginable chicanery. It is an interesting fact that there are more Slovak papers in the United States than in Hungary. These American papers the Hungarian Government considers a menace to the Hungarian State, and accordingly refuses them postal privileges.

The Hungarian Government is mainly in the hands of the Magyar nobility, and the Hungarian parliament is merely a parliament of this nobility. There are scarcely a million voters in Hungary, yet during the lives of men now living there has never been a Hungarian election that was free from violence and corruption, and that was conducted without the aid of soldiery. Although the Magyars form only 51 per cent of the population, they hold 405 out of 413 seats in the Parliament. Even these Magyar deputies do not really represent the Magyar people, for suffrage in Hungary is restricted to a relatively small number of the privileged. Seventy per cent of the lands of Hungary is in the hands of the nobles, and as a result Hungary is a country of chronic hunger.

It is evident that Austria bases her mission on the maxim "divide et impera" instead of reconciling the various nations on the Danube, uniting their interests, and binding them closer together. She might have been, and should have been, a Federal State wherein all nationalities living under Hapsburg sovereignty would have enjoyed equal treatment and equal rights. The present war shows, however, as indeed did the wars of 1859 and 1866, that Austria-Hungary is wholly unable to carry out her true historical mission and to rule justly the Bohemians and the other Austrian nationalities.

It must be remembered that in spite of all the obstacles placed before it, the Bohemian nation, during the last half of the nineteenth century and thereafter, rose higher and higher in the economic scale and in culture. Other Slav nationalities in Austria-Hungary have experienced a similar awakening. After the Balkan States defeated Turkey in 1912 and 1913 the Austrian and Magyar oppressors began to fear that the contest they were waging against the Slavs in Austria would ultimately end in their own defeat, unless they once more adopted the most extreme measures to prevent the legitimate growth of Slav nationalities within the empire, as well as beyond its boundaries. The present war is therefore but the intensification of a struggle the Austrian and Hungarian Governments had long been carrying on against their Slav subjects.

The result of the Balkan wars was that in 1913 the German Government asked the Reichstag for an increase of military appropriations. In his speech in support of the measure, delivered on the 7th of April, 1913, the former German chancellor, Bethmann von Hollweg, made a statement which deserves to be quoted:

"For the future it is decisive that in place of European Turkey, whose life as a State has become passive, have appeared States that show a remarkable vigor. We all have an interest in seeing this power prove itself of the best in peace as it has done in war, and to see the Balkan States grow in close economic and cultural contact with their neighbors and with the group of western powers. Thus they will also be factors making for progress and European peace. But in spite of this, one thing is certain, if it should ever come to a European war wherein Slavs and Germans stand against each other, then it would mean damage to the Germans if, in the present system of equilibrium, the southern Slav States should take the place hitherto occupied by European Turkey."

These are thoughts couched in diplomatic language, but it is obvious that even then the German chancellor had in mind the bugaboo of a racial conflict between Slavs and Germans. Only a month after the speech of the chancellor there was published in the Frankfurter Zeitung a Vienna letter entitled "Oesterreichische Katastrophenpolitik." The writer speaks of the fact that owing to Serbian growth Austria had been twice compelled to increase its military budget and indicates that the real instigator of all these alleged troubles is Russia; that there is just one way of stopping all this, "to destroy the tools of pan-Slavism, to subjugate the small neighbors, to destroy the Russian Empire, and to form a number of buffer States under an Austrian and German protectorate between the remnants of the Russian Empire and central Europe."

We find here a very frank confession that internal conditions in Austria require severe measures; that it has been impossible to solve the Bohemian question, the Polish-Ruthenian question, and other similar problems; that these matters endanger Austria's very existence, and that even if all this should lead to a European war the central powers would have nothing to fear, because they are stronger than Russia and her friends. It is even admitted that in this event Austria would have nothing to lose. With the growth of Slav nationalities within her borders she would be doomed to inevitable destruction in the course of time, while in a war she might have a chance to save herself. A sudden catastrophe would be preferable to terror without end.

When Roumania entered the war the "Pesti Hirlap," an influential Budapest paper, declared that Austria-Hungary must decide between Slavism and Germanism—this in an Empire the larger part of which is Slav. It is not an exaggeration to say, therefore, that this is a war by Austria against her own dependent nationalities. From this it logically follows that Austria has lost her right to exist. She is a State without a purpose, unless this purpose be the oppression of the majority of her own subjects.

The Bohemians now claim complete independence. As early as November 14, 1915, the Bohemian foreign committee, representing Czecho-Slovaks, issued in Paris a manifesto demanding an independent Bohemian-Slovak State. During the recent session of the Austrian Parliament the club of Czech deputies openly demanded independence for Bohemia, the new State to include the Slovaks. Bohemians living in France, England, and Russia are fighting in the armies of the allies. There has been a Bohemian-Slovak army cooperating with the Russians; it consisted of former Austrian prisoners of war who surrendered voluntarily in order to reenlist with the Russians and fight against Austria for the independence of their native land. Moreover, the Bohemian-Slovak brigade has been mentioned as having won special distinction on Galician battlefields.

A small group of English pacifists and well-meaning American theorists, who do not understand that no comparison whatever is possible between the United States and Austria-Hungary, still seem to think that the latter can become a Federal State. This might have been possible prior to the rise of the present spirit of nationalism, had Austrian statesmen been farsighted enough to realize that the only salvation for Austria was to be sought in making of her a union of free nationalities. But now it is too late.

A glance at a few figures will sufficiently demonstrate this: The whole population of the Empire is 52,000,000—28,000,000 in the Austrian half of the monarchy; 22,000,000 in the Hungarian part; and 2,000,000 in Bosnia-Herzegovina. According to the latest census, that of 1910, the population of Austria is divided as follows: Germans, 9,950,225; Czechs, 6,435,983; Poles, 4,967,984; Ruthenians, 3,518,854; Slovenes, 1,252,940; Serbo-Croats, 783,334; Italians, 768,422. The Germans, although numbering not quite 10,000,000, control the destinies of the 18,000,000 of non-Germans. In Hungary, according to the same census, there are 10,050,575 Magyars, 3,949,032 Roumanians, 2,937,435 Germans, 1,967,979 Slovaks, 2,939,638 Serbo-Croats, 472,587 Ruthenians. It should be remembered, of course, that the official census is grossly inaccurate and misrepresents matters in favor of the Germans and Magyars. There is little doubt that there are in the Empire almost 8,000,000 Czechs and almost 3,000,000 Slovaks. In any event, the Germans and Magyars together do not exceed 20,000,000, and rule over 32,000,000 Slavs and Latins, who in this war are forced to fight the battles of their oppressors.

"Home rule all around" might be possible if the Dual Monarchy should be preserved in its entirety, but this would mean a continued violation of the principle of nationality and the violation of the right of the several nations to choose the sovereigns which are to rule over them. The Italians have a claim to the Trentino and a part of the Adriatic coast; the Roumanians [illegible]im Transylvania; the Serbs are entitled to Bosnia-Herzegovina; C[illegible]dia and Dalmatia should form, with Serbia and Montenegro an independent Jugo-Slav State; and the Austrian Poles should be united with Russian Poland. These claims can not be disregarded, but if they are duly observed the Czecho-Slovaks will be left alone with the Germans and Magyars in a smaller Austria, which will continue to cooperate with Germany in her imperialistic endeavors, and constitute a foundation for another attempt to realize the Mittel Europa scheme.

The only solution of the problem appears to be the joining of the fragments of those races which already have a national state to the parent races; the creation of an independent Bohemian State and of an independent Hungary—reduced, of course, to its proper ethical boundaries. The Austrian-Germans in the purely German Provinces of Austria should be left to decide their own destinies; they could either form an independent State, or else be absorbed into the German Empire. This arrangement, by the way, would not strengthen Germany, as some claim, since it must be remembered that if the principle of nationality is carried out to its logical conclusion, Germany will lose at least a part of Alsace-Lorraine and Schleswig-Holstein, as well as Poland, so that what she may gain on the one hand she will lose on the other. Moreover, the present stand of Germany against the whole world is made possible because she has control of the 32,000,000 Slavs and Latins within the Austrian Empire; once these peoples are liberated, Germany will lose this reservoir of human material, be correspondingly weakened, and her imperialistic designs thwarted.

The future Czecho-Slovak State will have a population of more than 12,000,000, of whom 10,000,000 are Czecho-Slovaks. It goes without saying that the rights of the minority would have to be protected, although the fact is that the Slav races have never been known for their attempts to impose their language and culture upon other peoples. This seems to be exclusively the trait of the Germans, who always couple their designs of economic penetration with a policy of denationalization of the people of the territories they control, or intend to control.

From an economic point of view, Bohemia would have an assured future, for she possesses all the natural resources necessary to an economically self-sustaining State. While she may not have an outlet to the sea, the example of Switzerland shows that a port is not especially necessary for an independent State. Again, the principle laid down by President Wilson as to economic rights of way for landlocked States would apply to Bohemia as well as to the need of Russia to obtain access to a warm-water port. Bohemia, because of her geographical position as a link between western Europe and the eastern Slav world, is destined to be of great political and economic importance. The fact that Bohemia was able for many centuries to oppose Germanization, although surrounded on all sides by powerful enemies, is the best proof of her capacity to oppose the future Pan-German plans of expansion toward the east, and to serve as a bulwark of permanent peace.

Whatever arguments for the dismemberment of the Empire may be offered in the future, none will be more weighty than the fact that each of the component States or nationalities making up the Austro-Hungarian monarchy forms by itself a distinct economic entity capable of a healthy growth and development. On the other hand, a compulsory union under the leadership of the incapable and decadent House of Hapsburg threatens them all with political, financial, and economic ruin. Wealthy and full of resources separately, together they form the most poverty-stricken country in Europe.

It is interesting to glance at a few statistics indicating the state of the Austro-Hungarian national wealth and its relation to the national wealth of other countries. In 1914 the national wealth of Austria-Hungary was estimated at $25,000,000,000 and the debt at no less than $3,898,094,000. The distribution of the debt was as follows: Hungary, $1,338,348,000; Austria, $1,515,871,000; common, $1,043,675,000.

This means that for every six dollars of national wealth there was almost one dollar of national debt. A comparison of the financial condition of other countries at the same time with that of the dual monarchy shows that of the six leading nations of the world Austria-Hungary was in the worst financial condition. Experienced financiers asserted that under normal conditions a national debt of $6,000,000,000 would be the utmost that the Austro-Hungarian monarchy could bear without complete economic ruin. Long before the war industries had begun to feel the burden of government taxes. The textile industry was completely ruined. Other industries were slowly but surely on the road to a complete extinction. There was a general apprehension that capital would soon be withdrawn from the monarchy and invested in more favorable regions. The industrial life was not only affected by the foreign policy of the monarchy, but likewise by the abnormal internal situation, which sapped the energies and vitality of all of the races that were herded together under a single government.

During the war Austria's debt must have increased enormously. According to some estimates, it has at least quadrupled, which, of course, under the corrupt system prevalent, is quite possible. If we make an allowance for depreciation in the national wealth due to war conditions, we have a situation where the national debt is not far below the national wealth. The conclusion is obvious. Austria-Hungary is on the verge of a complete bankruptcy. Unless it be split up into its component elements it offers practically no security to those who have given it their hard-earned funds.

Should the monarchy be preserved after the war, all the unnatural conditions leading to such a fatal result would be preserved intact. The nationalities which for hundreds of years have waged so keen a warfare against each other would no longer be content to live under the rule of the Hapsburgs. A continual internal strife would be the outcome, and as one of its effects Austria-Hungary would continue in its weak and unhealthy economic situation, being largely dependent on the support of Germany. Moreover, in the dual monarchy the parts occupied by Austrian Germans are the weakest and poorest of all. Other portions are continually called on to make up for the deficits that arise in them. For example, Bohemia pays no less than 62.7 per cent of the Austrian taxes, whereas its population is no more than 40 per cent of the total. This disproportion must lead to an antagonism between the various nationalities.

Previous to the war there was always a chance that the industrial development of the country would compensate for the growing interest charges and the growing debt. But after the war, if Austria-Hungary should still exist, industrial and commercial depreciation is bound to set in. The natural markets for Austro-Hungarian products—the Balkans—would be permanently lost to Austria-Hungary, for she is primarily liable for the misery which has befallen the small Balkan States. The commerce of Austria-Hungary would practically die out. Germany, during the war, has accumulated enormous supplies of manufactured products which she intends to release at once upon the conclusion of peace at very low prices in order to reconquer lost markets. But as the allied nations are well prepared to combat this influx of German-made goods, Austria-Hungary and Turkey would remain the only markets open to conquest by German commerce. And since the dual monarchy is in such bad financial straits, and since her industries are so crippled, German products would have no difficulty in driving her products out of the market. Her industries would virtually cease to exist, for they are in no position to combat German capital. The very thing which Austro-Hungarian statesmen feared before the war would inevitably take place. This commercial conquest would then be followed by political domination and this in turn by a conquest of Bulgaria and Turkey; and the road from Berlin to Bagdad would then be safe.

But the allies would find no profitable markets in Austria-Hungary after the war, as that country would be a poor buyer. It would be in no position to give sufficient guaranties of prompt payment. The present claims of foreign creditors would become a dead loss in many instances.

On the other hand, if the central powers are defeated and Austria is in consequence dismembered, the new independent States formed as a result and such countries as Italy and Rumania, which will regain their conationals, will, of course, have to bear the curse of their previous connection with Austria-Hungary. They will have to shoulder heavy economic burdens. But these burdens will be of a temporary nature. Most of these nationalities will recover with ease, and all of them, with the exception of the Magyars and the Germans, will seek to establish relations with the allies. They will likewise offer the greatest possible resistance to commercial conquest by Germany, and will constitute a natural barrier against German aggression in the Balkans. These States will be unwilling to waste their resources in military establishments, thereby getting rid of the heaviest burden which European States of to-day must bear.

The Czecho-Slovak State that would thus be created will be rich in natural resources, will have many well-developed industries, and a sound banking system. It will meet the immediate difficulties with ease, for its wealth will no longer be used to support the decadent dynasty of Vienna, and to make up for the recurrent deficit of other portions of the monarchy. The old antagonism between the Czecho-Slovaks and the Germans and Magyars is the most reliable guaranty of the opposition of the Czecho-Slovaks to German expansion in the East. It is well known that the dismemberment of Austria-Hungary is in accord with the aims of the allies, who have stated that the liberation of subject nationalities and their free development was one of their aims. A Czecho-Slovak State will also fit into an economic program following the war.

A policy of compromise with reference to the Austro-Hungarian problem would be the most serious blunder American statesmanship could commit. This would be akin to the blunder of European statesmanship which has permitted the Turk to remain in Europe for so long a time. For be it remembered that the Austro-Hungarian problem is the Turkish question in another form. Just as Turkey gradually disintegrated, so Austria is gradually disintegrating. Since 1866 she has been simply a German vassal State, and it is Berlin that makes possible the German and Magyar domination. This is a situation which requires not palliative measures, but a radical operation, to wit, a complete removal of this festering sore from the center of Europe. If war is the continuation of politics, the strategy of war must be brought into accord with the political objectives sought. The military mistakes of the allies in southeastern Europe were due to their failure to realize the importance of the Balkan and Austrian problems. Their view of these problems of late has been rectified. It will be well for America not only to learn to avoid the purely military mistakes of the allies but also to learn from them the necessity of clear political thinking in international matters. A condition of such clear political thinking is an appreciation of the real nature of the structure which goes by the name Austria-Hungary; that is not even a State, since it has become a tool of Germany; that at most it is a Government and a very poor one at that; that it is an anachronism, a survival of mediaevalism, an organization without a ruling idea, purely dynastic and artificial; that it has no place in the modern world; that its very existence is a denial of the principles for which America to-day stands.

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed happy that it is not any more necessary for me to plead for the recognition of the Czecho-Slovak cause. Recognition was given them by our Government on the 3d of this month, when the President authorized the Secretary of State to issue the following proclamation:

The Czecho-Slovak peoples having taken up arms against the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires, and having placed organized armies in the field which are waging war against those Empires under officers of their own nationality and in accordance with the rules and practices of civilized nations; and

The Czecho-Slovaks having, in prosecution of their independent purposes in the present war, confided supreme political authority to the Czecho-Slovak National Council,

The Government of the United States recognizes that a state of belligerency exists between the Czecho-Slovaks thus organized and the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires.

It also recognizes the Czecho-Slovak National Council as a de facto Government clothed with proper authority to direct the military and political affairs of the Czecho-Slovaks.

The Government of the United States further declares that it is prepared to enter formally into relations with the de facto government thus recognized for the purpose of prosecuting the war against the common enemy, the Empires of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

That this recognition was deserved is agreed by all who have followed the wonderful and unbelievable achievements of the Czecho-Slovak Army and the splendid services rendered by the Czecho-Slovak National Council.

Mr. Speaker, being also familiar with the oppression, suffering, and sacrifices of the Jugo-Slavs, as well as with their efforts, aspirations, and achievement and the services which they have rendered, I hope and trust that their recognition will not be delayed but will shortly be forthcoming. I am satisfied it will not only strengthen and aid their cause, but that it will materially aid the cause of the allies and the cause of democracy; being united as they now are, they are cooperating and rendering great service. I regret that very few Americans are familiar with the Jugo-Slavs, their movement, the country, and the people who compose it; of their just cause, and how important it is for the stability of Europe that they be recognized as an independent State. For your information, and with the permission of the House, I embody as part of my remarks the following article by Dr. H. Hinkovic, member of the Croatian and delegate to the Hungarian Parliament, which sets forth clearly what is meant by Jugo-Slavs and why it is of great importance that they be recognized:

THE JUGO-SLAV PROBLEM.

[By Dr. H. Hinkovic, member of the Croatian and delegate to the Hungarian Parliament.]

The Jugo-Slavs are the southern Slavs. "Jug" is the word for "south" in all Slavic languages. In history the Jugo-Slavs appear under three names—Croats, Serbs, and Slovenes. But these are not three different nationalities. Sprung from the same stock, speaking the same language, inhabiting a continuous territory, having identical customs, and, above all, identical aspirations, the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes are one single nation, designated by one common name—Jugo-Slavs.

The Bulgars do not look upon themselves as Slavs.

* * * * * * *

However, in spite of themselves, they are Slavs, or, rather, slavisized. Still they remain Tartars in spirit; they stay outside the Jugo-Slav family. Thus our appellation "Jugo-Slavs," embracing as it does the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to the exclusion of the Bulgars, has no real ethnical significance. It is a purely political expression.

It was during the lapse of time from the fifth to the seventh century that the Jugo-Slavs migrated from the trans-Carpathian regions into their present home.

They number about 13,000,000. Five million live in Serbia and Montenegro, 7,500,000 in Austria-Hungary, and about 700,000 are living—for the greater part temporarily—in the two Americas and the British colonies and dominions. Others are settled in northern Albania; in Greece they reach as far south as Saloniki; in Bulgaria as far as the River Iskra and the Perin Mountains. About 40,000 Jugo-Slavs dwell in the Kingdom of Italy.

The western part of the Jugo-Slav territory in Austria-Hungary is occupied by the Slovenes, the center by the Croats, the east by the Serbs. But this is only a general statement. As a matter of fact, the Croat and Slovene element, on the one hand, and the Serb and Croat, on the other, are intermingled in the various countries.

* * * * * * *

The whole of Jugo-Slav history is full of struggles against Germans, Magyars, Turks, and Venetians. These perpetual conflicts with their invaders and oppressors have prevented them from achieving their unification.

* * * * * * *

The nearer we come to our own day the stronger grows the national spirit and the more ardent the desire for union.

* * * * * * *

The whole national life of the Jugo-Slavs have become impregnated with the Jugo-Slav idea. But the more this idea progressed the more it excited the persecuting fury of the Germans and Magyars, who—with good reason, by the way—looked upon it as highly dangerous to their hegemony.

The last 30 or 40 years of Jugo-Slav history are nothing but a fierce and unremitting fight on the part of the Austro-Hungarian authorities against the irresistible Jugo-Slav movement.

THE HOSTILE POLICY OF THE HAPSBURGS.

A few facts will make it clear what a diabolical policy the Hapsburgs have pursued with regard to the tendency toward unification displayed by their Jugo-Slav subjects.

A mere glance at a map shows that the Jugo-Slav lands under the Hapsburg rule form one continuous, unbroken, territorial block. Now, this block is shared between the two halves of the monarchy and incidentally subdivided under 11 administrations and 14 different legislations.

These 11 separate administrations are: (1) Croatia-Slavonia, (2) Rijeka (Fiume, "corpus separatum"), (3) Dalmatia, (4) Istria, (5) the city and district of Trieste, (6) Gorica-Gradiska, (7) Carniola, (8) Carinthia, (9) Styria, (10) the southern Slav districts incorporated in Hungary proper, and (11) Bosnia-Hetzegovina. Croatia-Slavonia having complete autonomy in home affairs, justice, public instruction, and ecclesiastical matters, has an independent legislation with regard to these. The southern Slav districts in Hungary, being under direct Hungarian rule, share the legislation of Hungary proper. Rijeka has but a municipal council. All provinces belonging to Austria send deputies to the Vienna Reichsrat, while Croatia-Slavonia has for her common affairs with Hungary a common legislation in the Parliament of Budapest, this parliament being both a provincial diet for Hungary and a common diet for all the countries of St. Stephen's Crown, i. e., Hungary proper and Croatia-Slavonia. Besides this, there are the Austrian and Magyar delegations for the common affairs of the whole monarchy.

* * * * * * *

The object of this parceling out was to divide the Jugo-Slav nation, which is one, by a series of water-tight compartments, so as to estrange us each from the other and to prevent our unification.

The result was finally the very opposite of what was intended. The more the Jugo-Slav have been artificially divided the more they became conscious of the absolute necessity to unite. Seeing on the one hand the continuous block of their territory, and on the other the cunning contrivance of their enemies to separate them, it was quite natural that the eagerness of the Jugoslavs for their union at last became irresistible.

THE NEW ERA.

Meantime, most important events had taken place in Serbia in 1903. The accession of Peter Karagiorgjevic to the Serbian throne hastened the amazing renaissance of the little kingdom, moral, military, and economic. And it became apparent that Serbia was destined to play the part of the Jugo-Slav Piedmont.

* * * * * * *

ANTI-JUGO-SLAV CAMPAIGN.

The possibility of Jugo-Slav unification outside Austria-Hungary—a direct menace to the territorial integrity of the dual monarchy, which it prepared itself to obviate by taking action against the two centers of the movement, one of which lay within its borders among the Austro-Hungarian Jugo-Slavs, and the other without, viz, the Kingdom of Serbia. Thence the pitiless persecutions of the former, and the implacable war, both diplomatic and economic, upon the latter.

* * * * * * *

Austria-Hungary was conducting a remorseless campaign, on the one hand, against her own Jugo-Slav subjects, and, on the other hand, against Serbia, both with the object of crushing the movement for Jugo-Slav unification. The achievement of this unification would perforce destroy the hegemony of the Germano-Magyars, and these were not in the least disposed to abdicate. Moreover, from the point of view of foreign politics, the territorial integrity of the Hapsburg monarchy was endangered by the attraction Serbia possessed for the Jugo-Slavs who were oppressed by the Germano-Magyars. Finally, and above all things, Serbia was blocking the way for Austria-Hungary's expansion toward Salonica. This way leads through the valleys of the Morava and the Vardar. Serbia had therefore to become an Austrian vassal or to disappear.

But it was not only in Austria-Hungary that the storm was brewing against Serbia; the home of the tempest lay farther off.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY PUSHED ON BY GERMANY.

To-day one can clearly see Bismarck's idea, when he refused to touch Austria after the victory of Sadowa. Prussia proposed to absorb her completely later on. Germany was thrusting Austria toward the Ægean, but she considered her only as an extension of her own hand. In this spirit, and as the first stage on the road to the east, she caused Bosnia-Herzegovina to be allotted to Austria by the treaty of Berlin.

Germany was therefore to a very great extent more or less interested in everything that happened in Austria-Hungary and in all that concerned her. The Jugo-Slav movement, which threatened her domestic peace, might weaken Austria-Hungary's military strength, which Germany was planning to make use of at the proper time. Therefore Germany desired the war with Serbia in order to preserve Austria from the loss of military strength with which she was threatened by the Jugo-Slav movement, and also in order to eliminate, by the crushing of Serbia, the principal obstacle to her pan-German ambition.

Serbia has been reproached with being the cause of the war. This is true, in so far as, by her geographical position and as the standard bearer of the Jugo-Slav movement, she was an obstacle to the Pan-German Berlin-Bagdad scheme.

PAN-GERMANISM.

* * * * * * *

One of the aims of Pan-Germanism is its expansion toward the southeast. Salonica and Constantinople are only preliminary stages. It aspires toward horizons more distant—toward Bagdad, the Persian Gulf, toward Egypt and India.

Serbia was the first dike encountered by the German tide. Twice running she, the tiny David, had hurled the Austrian Goliath back across her frontiers. But in the end, without help at the right time, she could not but succumb to the united attack of four bandits—the German, the Austrian, the Magyar, and the Bulgar. * * *

Obviously, a dike will have to be rebuilt. I do not say the dike, because the former dike, Serbia before the war, has proved inadequate.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY MUST BE BROKEN UP.

First of all, before reconstructing the dike, the force of the current which it will be called upon to resist must be diminished. Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria must be forcibly detached from Germany's grip. These two States have lost their independence, and at the present moment they are merely vassal States of Germany. Especially Austria-Hungary. Germany has laid her hand upon the army, the diplomacy, the economic life, and even upon the civil administration of the empire of the Hapsburgs. This empire contains 12,000,000 Germans and 10,000,000 Magyars, while the remainder is Slav and Latin. Moreover, these remaining 29,000,000 are implacable foes of Germany. In spite of this, they are forcibly enrolled in the Austro-Hungarian armies, and are fighting for a cause which they detest.

If Austria-Hungary remains, this monstrous phenomenon will repeat itself in yet another war. In order to render it impossible, these 29,000,000 must be amputated from the Austro-Magyar, i. e., from the German, block.

* * * * * * *

BULGARIA MUST BE REDUCED.

Besides Austrophils and Magyarophils there are also Bulgarophils among the allies, who would be quite disposed, in the event of a separate peace, to confirm the Bulgars in the possession of all they filched from the Serbs and under such odious circumstances.

By diplomatic subterfuges, of which they are past masters, the Bulgars are—even after their felony—keeping up friendly feeling among the allies. Conformably with their spirit of duplicity, they invariably keep two irons in the fire. They are with the Germans, but if German affairs turn out badly, they will repudiate Ferdinand and sacrifice Radoslavov.

But the Bulgarian people are in perfect concord with their sovereign. Has a single voice from among the people been raised against the war? Let no one be misled by the "Realists" of Sofia. Ferdinand suits the Bulgars admirably, and the Bulgars are well worthy of their King.

The Bulgars manifested themselves as the vanguard of Germany, and are therefore as dangerous and pernicious as herself. A separate peace by which they would keep Macedonia, or simply their ancient frontiers would enable them to assail Serbia again on the first opportunity, and eventually Greece and Roumania. For theirs is a vast ambition. They dream of an empire, washed by three seas, and investing them with the hegemony in the Balkans. Their plan is for the Balkans what the Pan-German plan is for Europe and the world. They fancy themselves in the rôle of Balkan emulators of the Prussians. As a matter of fact, they are only a tentacle of the foul octopus of the Spree.

Why should the Bulgars be favored to the detriment of the Serbs? Why continue the clumsy policy of endeavoring to gain more than doubtful friends at the expense of the Serbs, who have sacrificed themselves for the cause of the allies?

Have morality, right, and justice truly lost all their value? You have Serbia and Bulgaria before you—honesty and crime—self-sacrifice and felony. And you would say to the bandit: "Keep what you have stolen" and to his victim "He did well to rob you." Is the generous blood of millions of human beings shed in order to sanction a moral code like this?

It is obvious that to strengthen Bulgaria would be to strengthen Germany, who makes use of Bulgaria for her Berlin-Bagdad scheme. The hegemony in the Balkans, which the Bulgars covet, is closely bound up with Pan-Germanism. Bulgaria must therefore be reduced to a state in which she can neither be a danger to the Balkans nor the catspaw of Germany.

* * * * * * *

A REESTABLISHED SERBIA WOULD NOT BE SUFFICIENT.

There are some who imagine that a restored Serbia would be equal to this task. The mere resurrection of Serbia would be a reconstitution of the situation before the war. Why are we plunged into this horrible struggle? Because Serbia opposed herself to pan-Germanism, which aimed at Constantinople and through Austria-Hungary at Salonica. Serbia was too weak to resist. How can we imagine that she would be stronger after the agony that has laid waste her lands and killed off nearly a quarter of her population? Serbia, merely restored, would be incapable of surviving.

Then again, there is the suggestion made of an aggrandized Serbia, as a recompense for her superhuman sacrifices for the common cause and the tragic misfortunes that have befallen her. But even an aggrandized Serbia would not survive. Something more than a restored or aggrandized Serbia is required.

THE JUGO-SLAV PROGRAM.

The Jugo-Slav program is drawn up in the Declaration of Corfu, July 20, 1917. Its makers are the Serbian Government and the Jugo-Slav committee as representatives, the former of Serbia and the latter of the Jugo-Slavs in Austria-Hungary. The Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, proclaim the declaration, compose by blood, language, and all vital interests one and the same nation. This virtually already united nation desires ardently the liberation of those unfortunate members who languish under the Austro-Magyar domination. All Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes wish to form, on the broadest democratic basis, one independent State, embracing the whole Jugo-Slav race. The constitution of this new State is to be laid down by a constituent assembly, elected by universal suffrage, with direct and secret ballot.

The constitution "will be the source and the consummation of all authority and of all rights by which the entire life of the nation will be regulated."

The declaration is based on the principle of nationality and the right of self-determination of every people.

The act of Corfu has been communicated to all allied powers. (Lord Robert Cecil acknowledged, November 28, 1917, in the House of Commons, that His Majesty's Government received the communication of this document "with great interest and sympathy.") Its high importance is obvious. Serbia indorsed the Jugo-Slav program as her war aim. She officially accepted the rôle of a Jugo-Slav Piedmont and notified her allies of this. She became the diplomatic spokesman of the Austro-Hungarian Jugo-Slavs and the representative of the whole future united Jugo-Slav commonwealth. Potentially this State is already in existence, and the Corfu declaration is its certificate of birth. * * *

THE "KNOCK-OUT" FOR GERMANY.

Jugo-Slav unification assumes the deliverance of Serbia and the collapse of Austria-Hungary. Fortunately for us, these are also the conditions of a true victory of the allies and a safe future for Europe. It becomes more and more obvious that the war will be decided where it began—in the Balkans. * * *

JUGO-SLAVIA.

Only an integral victory can bring to the Jugo-Slavs their deliverance and union, and to the world lasting peace and freedom. An independent Czecho-Slovakia and Poland will be the first line of defense against pan-Germanism, and Jugo-Slavia will be the second. The more complete the State of Jugo-Slavia the more efficient will be her resistance.

Mr. Speaker, after the collapse of the military power of Russia, the Jugo-Slav Army in Russia was removed from the Russian chaos, and by way of Archangel, England, France, and the Mediterranean was sent to the Saloniki front. The Prince Regent of Serbia, commander in chief of the Serbian Army, ordered the formation of a special Jugo-Slav division, in which the former subjects of Austria-Hungary were placed and in which those Jugo-Slavs fought ever since. This division uses not only the Serbian flag but also the Croatian and Slovenian flags, and is thereby to be considered to be the first unit of the future army of Jugo-Slavia.

Shortly after the above Jugo-Slav Army left Russia for the Saloniki front, another strong Jugo-Slav volunteer contingent left Russia by way of Siberia, Vladivostok, and the Suez Canal for Saloniki. This contingent numbered, upon its arrival at the destination, 4,800 men and officers.

From the begining of the war a great number of Jugo-Slavs who were forced to serve in the Austrian Army but who surrendered to the Serbians joined the Serbian Army as volunteers and fought with it. Thousands of these volunteers perished during the Serbian retreat through the Albanian Mountains. After this tragic collapse, the remnants of these volunteer troops were reorganized and also sent to the Saloniki front.

Three thousand and five hundred Jugo-Slav volunteers came from Russia by way of Roumania and joined the Serbian Army. They also participated in the great retreat through Albania and are now, in large majority, fighting on the Saloniki front. To these are to be added the contingents from both Americas and from Australia. The United States sent about 5,000 Jugo-Slav volunteers, South America 300, and Australia and New Zealand 550. All these volunteers are fighting in the Jugo-Slav division and many more are attached to other units of the Serbian Army. They all represent the true revolutionary spirit of the Jugo-Slavs in Austria-Hungary, who are in revolt against their oppressors.

During the campaign of last September in Macedonia the Jugo-Slav division was in action and scored a great success, taking the massif of Kozjak, one of the most important points in the present offensive. Accordingly, we can consider the recent campaign in Macedonia as an actual proof of the successful belligerency of the Jugo-Slavs.

On the Italian front 30,000 Jugo-Slavs surrendered to the Italian armies. These prisoners of war are now being organized into a Jugo-Slav army, and the organization is almost accomplished. It is, indeed, the result of the work of the Jugo-Slav committee. Hatred against Austria-Hungary and boundless devotion to the ideals of national independence and unity and its bearer, the Jugo-Slav committee, thoroughly pervades this army, which is anxiously awaiting the moment when they will enter, in victorious advance, the Jugo-Slav lands.

The third front on which the Jugo-Slavs are now fighting is the eastern, or Russian, front. The bulk of the Jugo-Slav troops left Russia when the Bolsheviks came to power, but various small Jugo-Slav units remained in Russia, where they have now a great chance to perform a historic task. About 5,000 Jugo-Slav volunteers, starting from Odessa, on the Black Sea, continued fighting and succeeded in reaching the northern sea. In reaching Samara these Jugo-Slavs put an end there to the Bolshevik anarchy and installed their own authority, but soon after they left for Archangel. Many thousands of Jugo-Slavs are now cooperating with the Czecho-Slovaks, and are under the command of Col. Marinkovitch, fighting against the Bolsheviks. A contingent of 3,000 Jugo-Slav volunteers participated at the capture of Vladivostok.

It is with deep feeling and satisfaction that I learn the foreign-born Jugo-Slavs are now heroically fighting under the Stars and Stripes with the American Army against the power in whose dominion they were born.

Not only do I believe in the recognition of the Jugo-Slavs, but also the recognition of United Poland. You, perhaps, are informed of the history and struggle of the Polish people, of the heroic deeds of the Polish Army, and of the unjustifiable partition of Poland by Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia; but I desire at this point to insert an article by Stanislas Kozicki, entitled "The Poles under Prussian rule," which I hope will serve to enlighten the Membership of the House of the importance of the recognition of United Poland:

THE POLES UNDER PRUSSIAN RULE FROM THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER.

[By permission of the Leonard Scott Publication Co.]

Lord Denbigh's admirable propaganda in Parliament and on the platform has greatly helped to bring home to Englishmen the true nature and scope of German war aims in the East. But there is a point in connection with this problem which still perhaps requires to be explained—the question of Poland. The term Mittel Europa concisely but adequately describes the nature of German imperialistic ambitions in central and eastern Europe; it is not, however, clearly realized that a restored, united, and independent Poland would be the end of such ambitions, yet such is the fact, and it is not too much to say that Poland, with all that word implies, cooperating with all those other nations whose lot is bound up with her own, is the sole true effective and complete answer to Mittel Europa. Poland or Mittel Europa, that is in reality the issue, and the world has not to choose between the two.

The Polish question at this moment presents to a careless observer a somewhat confused appearance. All the belligerent powers agree that the restoration of an independent Polish State must be one of the conditions of a settlement. In reality, however, a chasm divides the two camps. The central powers propose to build the new Poland out of the territories taken from Russia. They might even agree to add to this new Polish State the Polish territory belonging to Austria, but they are inflexibly opposed to the surrender of the Polish territories which now belong to Prussia. On this point Germany refuses to make any compromise whatever. The powers of the entente, upon the other hand, in their declarations speak of reuniting all Polish territories. The reference of Mr. Lloyd-George, on the 7th of January, 1918, to an "independent Poland comprising all those genuinely Polish elements who desire to form part of it," and that of President Wilson, on the 9th of January, 1918, to "territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations," can not mean anything else than that the Polish territories of Prussia must form part also of the future Polish State. Again, in the important note issued by the prime ministers and foreign ministers of the entente assembled in London and published in the Times of March 19, 1918, the following words occur:

"Why waste time over German pledges when we see that at no period in her history of conquest—not when she overran Silesia, not when she partitioned Poland—has she exhibited herself so cynically as the destroyer of national independence, the implacable enemy of the rights of man, and the dignity of civilized nations?

"Poland, whose heroic spirit has survived the cruelest of national tragedies, is threatened with a fourth partition, and to aggravate her wrongs the devices by which the last trace of her independence is to be crushed are based on fraudulent promises of freedom."

In thus speaking of Silesia and the partitioning of Poland by Frederick the Great, the allied prime ministers come to the very root of the whole question—the future of the Polish territories seized by Frederick the Great and belonging now to Prussia. Upon the future of these territories the whole Polish question turns. It is therefore essential to form a clear idea upon this subject—what the Polish population of Prussia actually is and how it is distributed.

The Polish population of Prussia is distributed over four Prussian Provinces: (1) Silesia; (2) Posen; (3) West Prussia; and (4) East Prussia. Each of these Provinces has a different historical past, a different social structure, and a different racial percentage. The Germans who are to be found in them settled among the Polish population, which had inhabited these territories from time immemorial, in different numbers and at different epochs. It is therefore necessary to consider each of the four Provinces separately.

(1) SILESIA.

Let us consider first the Province of Silesia. Here the actual number of the Poles is larger than in any other of the Polish Provinces of Prussia. Here, too, the pressure upon the Poles has been the heaviest. This Province was taken from Poland in the fourteenth century, and is divided at present into three "regencies."

Two of these regencies are completely Germanized. As Polish now can be considered only that part of Silesia called the Regency of Opeln—that is, Upper Silesia. Even in this part the upper classes are principally German. The Germanization of Upper Silesia, which had always maintained its Polish character, began immediately after Frederick the Great seized it from Austria in 1742. The means employed by Frederick the Great to Germanize this district are astonishing. One example will suffice. It was actually verboten for people to marry who did not speak German. German policy thus brought it about that the upper classes lost their nationality and became Germanized. In spite, however, of all the efforts of Frederick the Great and his successors the peasantry remained Polish, and from this peasantry in the second half of the nineteenth century there began to arise a Polish bourgeoisie and professional class. The vast majority of the peasants and the workmen in the mines and factories continue to be Polish to this day, and have defeated every attempt at denationalization. According to the German census of 1910, the Germans in the Regency of Opeln formed 40 per cent of the population. But it is certain these figures are exaggerated. The Germans had passed a law regarding public meetings which permitted the use of Polish only where Poles were in a majority of over 60 per cent. Thus the figures of the census were reduced to the lowest possible level in order to suit the administration of this law. But, even accepting German statistics, if we take away three districts on the German frontier in which there is a large percentage of Germans, in the remaining 21 districts the Germans form but 33 per cent of the population—according to German statistics themselves. Authoritative Polish statisticians, however, estimate the Germans as forming only 20 per cent of the population. In the year 1910 the actual number of Poles in the Regency of Opeln, acording to German official statistics, was 1,258,000; according to Polish statistics, 1,560,000. This population is composed almost entirely of peasants and workmen. It is a genuinely Polish element, indigenous to the country, and has inhabited this territory without a break from prehistoric times.

(2) POSEN.

[Total population (1910), 2,099,831.]

The Province of Posen contains almost as many Polish inhabitants as Upper Silesia, and is called by Poles "the Grand Duchy of Poznan." Here Polish society has maintained its old structure. The Polish population of Upper Silesia consists mainly of peasants and workmen, but in Poznan there is a Polish landed nobility and a large Polish professional class. Moreover, in the second half of the nineteenth century a strong Polish middle class arose in the towns. The Jews have emigrated, as from other parts of Germany. Poznania is to-day the only part of Poland where a strong Polish middle class occupied in trade and small industries exist. The northern part of this Province—the regency of Bromberg (Bydgoszcz)—was annexed to Prussia by Frederick the Great in the first partition of Poland, 1772. The systematic Germanization of this district was inaugurated by him. He seized the property of the Polish State and of the church and planted German colonists throughout. After the French Revolution, Poznania (with the exception of a few districts on the German frontier) was incorporated in 1807 into the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, but was given back definitely to Prussia at the Congress of Vienna. Soon after its incorporation into Prussia the Germanization of this Province was again set afoot, and after the Franco-German War it was carried on with redoubled energy by Bismarck. The German Government, under his inspiration and guidance, elaborated a drastic program of Germanization; it founded in 1886 the commission of colonization, to which it gave enormous sums of money; it Germanized the schools and the whole administration and instituted laws of exception which culminated in the notorious law for the compulsory expropriation of Polish landed property. A little later, too, in 1894, at the instigation of Bismarck, though now in retirement, was founded the famous political society, the Ostmarkenverein, for advancing German "kultur" among the Poles. The members of this society were nicknamed "Hakatists," from the first letters of the names of their leaders, Hansemann, Kennemann, and Tiedemann. In spite, however, of all the huge efforts made since the time of Frederick the Great to Germanize it, Poznania remains to-day a strong Polish Province, and the Poles of Poznania are perhaps the most energetic and the most conscious of their nationality of all the Poles of Poland.

Until the year 1890 no reliable statistics of nationality existed. Only the statistics of religious denominations can give us some insight into the situation before this date. In Poznania nearly all the Catholics are Poles, the Germans in Poznania being almost entirely Protestants. In 1816, 65 per cent of the population of Poznania was Catholic; in 1867, 62 per cent; in 1880, 66 per cent; in 1890, 67 per cent. In 1890 the first reliable statistics of nationality were published by the German official authorities, and according to them the Germans formed 39.5 per cent of the population. In 1910 it was estimated officially at 38.4 per cent. The diminuation of the percentage of Germans, which runs parallel to the increase of the Poles, is due to the fact that the birth rate is higher among Poles than among Germans.

The total number of Poles in the Province of Posen is 1,291,000, or 61.5 per cent. These are German official figures, but in accepting them we must remember that the German Government has many means of influencing Poles who are employed by the Government, or by German proprietors and employers, to inscribe themselves as Germans in the census. Authoritative Polish statisticians reckon that out of 141,000 persons inscribed as German Catholics in the census of 1910 half may be considered Poles. In this case, the Polish population would form 65 per cent. If, moreover, we take away three districts on the German frontier which have a German majority, this percentage would be very greatly increased.

A change in political conditions would make a further difference. Poznania swarms with German officials. All the Germans connected with German rule in Poznania, who are almost invariably imported from other parts of Germany, all the officials, school-teachers, and State railway employees, all the "Beamten" class, would leave the country. The deduction of German bureaucracy from the statistics of Poznania would be no small one, and the German element, which is at present largely artificial and imported, would be reduced to its natural proportions.

(3) WEST PRUSSIA.

[Total population (1910), 1,703,474.]

The greater part of this Province, formerly called Royal Prussia, as belonging to the King of Poland, was annexed by Frederick the Great at the first partition, 1772, to the remainder by his nephew, Frederick William II, in 1793. No part of ancient Poland is so necessary to Poland as this Province, for it is here that Poland has access to the sea.

The whole seacoast from Leba to Dantzig is inhaoited by Polish fishermen and farmers who, despite all oppression, have not lost their national character. After annexing it, Frederick, seeing its immense importance to Prussia, made every effort to Germanize the country. There were already a considerable number of German colonists here, established in old times by the Teutonic knights and by German monasteries. But the Poles formed the vast majority of the inhabitants, and Frederick set to work to Germanize them. This effort has been continued by all his successors up to the present time. It is for this reason that the Germanization of this territory is more advanced than that of the Grand Duchy of Poznan. The Germans are convinced that West Prussia is an issue greater even than Posen in the battle between Germans and Poles; perhaps the supreme question in the struggle. West Prussia means for Poland access to the sea. Germany intends to block that access to the sea at any cost. If she lost West Prussia, her control on Poland would be gone and the Baltic would cease to be a German lake.

According to German statistics of 1858, the Germans formed 69 per cent of the Province of West Prussia. In 1890, 64.7 per cent; in 1910, 64.5 per cent. The total number of Poles in West Prussia is, according to German official statistics, 604,000. Here also Polish statisticians reckon that a number of Polish Catholics have been inscribed as Germans, and they estimate the Poles as forming 42.5 per cent of the whole population.

To show the general unreliability of German statistics in regard to this Province, it is sufficient to mention the fact that in the year of 1890 the official statistics gave the number of Poles as 34.4 per cent, and the number of voters for Polish candidates to the Reichstag on the basis of universal suffrage as 39.5. Yet it is certain that no Prussian ever voted for a Pole. The contrary is more often the case, as there are sometimes Poles insufficiently acquainted with politics or so intimidated by oppression as to vote for a Prussian.

If, however, we deduct from this Province certain districts on the German frontier, where Germanization has been greatest, the rest of the Province would have a Polish majority. The districts with decisive Polish majorities cover 60 per cent of the territory of the whole Province.

(4) EAST PRUSSIA.

[Total population (1910), 2,064,175.]

This Province, formerly called Ducal Prussia, was, in the Middle Ages, inhabited by the Prussians or Borussians, a race akin to the Lithuanian. These Lithuanian people were the original inhabitants. In the thirteenth century they were still pagan, and were continually making aggressions upon Poland. In 1226 Conrad, Duke of Massovia, a fief of Poland, took the fatal step of applying for assistance against them from the Teutonic Knights. This order, founded in 1190 for the defense of Christianity and its propagation, but confined to persons of German nationality, accepted the invitation. It set foot in East Prussia in 1231, but understood its evangelical mission in a peculiar way. The conversion of the heathen and the extermination of the heathen were to them synonymous terms. They offered the natives Germany or the sword, and, working in close cooperation with the German merchants of the Hanseatic League, succeeded by 1283 in Germanizing almost the whole of East Prussia from the Vistula to the Niemen. The savagery of these German Knights roused protests even in the Middle Ages. Roger Bacon, the famous Oxford Franciscan friar, who died in 1294, wrote of them in his Opus Majus, part 3, chapter 13, quoted by Mr. A. J. Little in his interesting book, Studies in English Franciscan History, as follows:

"The Saracens and pagans in many parts of the world are becoming quite impossible to convert, and especially beyond the sea, and in Prussia and the lands bordering on Germany, because the brethren of the German House (i. e., the Teutonic Knights) ruin all hopes of converting them, owing to the wars which they are always stirring up, and because of their lust of domination. There is no doubt that all the heathen nations beyond Germany would long ago have been converted but for the brutality of the brethren of the German House, because the pagan races have again and again been ready to receive the faith in peace through preaching. But they of the German House will not allow it, because they want to subjugate them and reduce them to slavery, and by subtle persuasions they have for many years deceived the Roman Church. This is notorious, otherwise I would not make the charge."

Such men were the spiritual ancestors of the German Commission of Colonization. They were the Hakatists of the Middle Ages, and many of the Prussian Junkers of to-day are lineally descended from members of this order.

In place of the exterminated Prussians, the Province was colonized by Germans in the north, by Lithuanians in the east, and by Poles in the south. When the Poles defeated the Teutonic Knights at Grunwald in 1410, the Poles and Lithuanians together formed about half the whole population. There were a number of Polish nobles in the Province, and a large Polish population in the towns. In 1525 a great event took place in the history of the Teutonic Order. The grand master, Albert, a Hohenzollern, became a Lutheran, married a daughter of the King of Denmark, and was invested by the King of Poland with the secularized and hereditary Duchy of East Prussia. His son, Duke Albert Frederick, succeeded him; but, born an imbecile, his imbecility soon developed into insanity and the succession passed to the Hohenzollerns of Brandenburg. East Prussia remained for a long time a fief of the Polish Crown, for which the dukes did homage; but in 1660 the dukes threw off their allegiance to Poland and acquired sovereign power. Not long after, in 1701, the reigning duke crowned himself at Konigsberg as the first king in Prussia—West Prussia was still Polish—and became a sovereign European prince. From that date the Hohenzollerns began to expel the Polish element and systematically to encourage German immigration.

The Poles form at present 17 per cent of the total population of the Province. They are concentrated mainly in the southern portion along the frontier of Russian Poland, the Regency of Allenstein or Olsztyn. The majority of these Poles are Protestants, and they are the object of unceasing attempts at Germanization on the part of the Government.

The total number of Poles in East Prussia is, according to German statistics, just over a quarter of a million—260,000.

These Poles live in a compact body in the south of the Province, in Mazuria, a district full of lakes, made famous by the fierce battles in 1914.

Although the percentage of Poles in East Prussia is small, two facts must be carefully borne in mind: (1) The Province of East Prussia is economically dead, being cut off from its Polish hinterland. It is more sparsely inhabited than any other Province of the kingdom of Prussia; there are only 144.1 inhabitants to the square mile, while in Westphalia there are 528.6; (2) owing to Prussian laws of exception, the German majority in this comparatively desert land is largely artificial.

No Pole is allowed to settle in East Prussia. Here, as in all the Polish Provinces of Prussia, permission from the Government must first be obtained to build a house. Needless to say, in the case of a Pole, such permission is never given. But if East Prussia were connected with its natural hinterland, and if Poles and Lithuanians were allowed freely to settle there, it would probably become from purely natural and economic causes a thriving Province with a predominantly Polish and Lithuanian population.

The same applies with still greater force to Dantzig in West Prussia. Dantzig was forcibly annexed by Frederick William II in the second partition of Poland, 1793. It is at present a small decayed town of 150,000 inhabitants. Its trade has been deliberately killed in favor of Hamburg and Bremen. If Dantzig were restored to Poland there is no reason why, in 50 years' time as the chief Poland seaport, it should not become a city of a million inhabitants.

To sum up. The total population of the four above-mentioned Provinces in 1910, according to official German statistics, was 6,554,755. Out of this total, 3,421,965 were Poles; 3,062,725 were Germans. Reliable Polish statisticians estimate that the Polish figures are 560,000 short, and that the Poles number almost exactly 4,000,000, out of a total population of 6,554,755. In the event of these provinces passing under Polish rule, and taking into account the departure of German officials and persons connected with the German Government, who number 5 to 6 per cent of the population, the percentage of Poles in these provinces, i. e.: (1) The Regency of Opeln, or Upper Silesia; (2) the Province of Posen (without certain Germanized districts in the west); (3) West Prussia (without certain Germanized districts in the west); and (4) the Regency of Allenstein (Olsztyn) in East Prussia, would amount to 70 per cent.

This is almost the same percentage as that of the Czechs in Bohemia and Moravia.

We thus see from all this that, in the question of the Polish population in Prussia, we have to deal with at least 4,000,000 Poles, settled compactly on a territory on which they form 70 per cent of the population.

The question of these 4,000,000 Poles is therefore, even if we regard their number alone, a highly important one. Their number is almost equal to that of the Kingdom of Serbia before the war, not far short of the population of Bohemia, much greater than that of Norway, and nearly equal to that of Sweden. The liberation of these Poles from Prussian rule would in itself, even if no other question were involved, be one of the greatest achievements of the war.

But there is much more. It is not a question of these Poles forming a separate State. Their claim, just in itself, is part of a greater, but a simpler, problem. The Poles of Prussia are striving, not merely for their liberation from the iniquity of Prussian rule, but for unity with their brethren. All that they demand is to be reunited with their brother Poles in one great independent State. From the point of view of number, the Poles occupy the sixth place among the nations of Europe, just below the Italians and above the Spaniards, and the State they would form would comprise at least 35,000,000 people. Now the Poles of Prussia, like all the Poles, aspire to a united Poland. Such is the one supreme desire of every Pole; and as the union of Italy and her liberation from Austrian domination was the greatest achievement of the nineteenth century, so the union of Poland may be the greatest of the twentieth.

It is almost impossible, I think, for an Englishman—difficult even for an Italian—to realize what the union of Poland means to a Pole. The Poles have had not one oppressor only; they have actually had three. To be ruled by one alien Government is a sufficient evil. It is a greater to be partitioned among three. By the partition, family life in Poland is severed and torn asunder, members of the same family may be Prussian, Austrian, or Russian subjects, subjected to different laws in regard to the very constitution of the family and society itself. By the partition, brothers and cousins may fight their own relatives in three different armies. By the partition, trade among Poles is checked and hindered; they are divided by the high walls of three different tariffs. On the deepest grounds, social, military, and economic, the Poles aspire to the political unity and independence of their nation.

Some men, however, raise the question, Surely, it would be sufficient if two parts of Poland were united and the third left out? Can not the Poles be content with a little Austrian Poland, under some Hapsburg, to which Russian Poland or part of it may be added under the same aegis? The partitions, say these men, shall be undone. Russia and Austria shall renounce their annexations, their share in the old plunder. Prussia alone, who initiated the partitions, and who, under Frederick the Great, was the chief author of the murder of Poland, shall keep her possessions. The Pole is asked to renounce Prussian Poland, to betray his compatriots, and to be content with a Poland formed out of her Austrian and Russian Provinces alone.

Such a renunciation is impossible. What would an Englishman think of an England partitioned among Prussia, Austria, and Russia? Would he think it sufficient or be content if two parts of England recovered their independence while the third pare, the south, the oldest part of England, the heart of England, Kent and Wessex, remained in the possession of Prussia? What would the unity and independence of England be, if, while two-thirds were reunited, London and the mouth of the Thames remained in German hands? No Englishman would be content. Nor will a Pole. For if the Thames means much to an Englishman, as the Seine to a Frenchman, the Vistula means yet more to a Pole. It is Poland's greatest and, in a deep sense, her only river, with which the most intimate associations of her history are bound up. It is Polish through and through, from its source to its mouth. Both Cracow—the Oxford of Poland—and Warsaw, her capital, lie upon its banks. At the mouth of it stands Dantzig. Now, Dantzig is to Poland what London, as England's chief port, is to England, and it is impossible for Poles to rest content while access to the sea is blocked to them, and Dantzig, their historic seaport, remains in German hands.

But if the complete reunion of Poland is necessary on general grounds, if it is the heart's desire of every Pole to see the end of Prussian rule, the complete reunion of his country, with access through his own great river to the sea, there are two special reasons why the union of these 4,000,000 Poles with the rest of Poland is indispensable.

First, Poznania is the cradle of the Polish race. Poznan is just as dear to a Pole as Krakow or Warzawa.

In addition to the social, economic, and military reasons for union spoken of above, there are the traditions of history. Sentiment plays no small part in politics, and there exists a sentiment which a great French writer has finely called le culte des morts. Poznania is sacred soil. It is the land where our ancestors lie buried.

Again, it must not be forgotten that the Poles of Prussia number among them some of the most energetic members of the Polish race. The general level of education is high. There are no illiterates among them. There is a strong middle class, and the Polish peasants on these territories are the best agriculturists of Poland. It is unthinkable, for these reasons, that the Poles of Prussia should be left under Prussian rule, or debarred from union with their brothers in one great Polish state. But there is a further consideration. Of all Poles, among the Poles of Prussia the consciousness of nationality is widest spread.

There is a well-known story of a Polish deputy who, visiting one day the cottage of a Polish peasant in Prussia, saw a portrait of Bismarck on the wall. "Are you an admirer of Bismarck?" asked the deputy. "Yes," said the peasant. "I owe Bismarck much. It was Bismarck who taught me to be a Pole."

Prussian persecution has not been without its natural effect. The oppressive laws of Prussia, from the time of Frederick the Great down to Bismarck, the commission of colonization, and the affair of Wreschen have had but one result; they have sharpened and intensified the national resistance. The Poles of Prussia are to-day the most Polish of the Poles. Ground by the teeth of wild beasts—to them may surely be applied a famous saying—they have become some of the purest members of the Polish nation.

As Mr. Geoffrey Drage, in his address to the Royal Statistical Society, March, 1918, admirably said:

"Perhaps the efforts of Marcinkowski to educate a professional and commercial middle class, and those of Wawrzyniak and Jackowski to build up an economic imperium in imperio, and internal commonwealth or peasant republic of cooperative institutions, as the foundation of a future Polish state would have failed had not Bismarck in a moment of supreme folly laid hands on the national religion and the national language and permanently estranged the Polish people. * * * The Kulturkampf was the beginning of the stern schooling, continued with a vast and vain expenditure to expropriate the Polish landowners, large and small, which has left the Prussian Poles the soundest economic Polish unit. * * * If Prussian Poland may be called, as I have elsewhere termed it, the heel of the German Achilles, it is also the one solid foundation which the European powers can give to the new Polish state. * * * It is the stern rule of the Prussian schoolmaster and the tyranny of the Prussian administrator and Prussian drill sergeant which have fitted the Prussian Poles to lead their fellow countrymen and head the flowing Slav tide, which has been for decades slowly but surely advancing into the German Empire. Moreover, of all Polish lands, German Poland has suffered least in population and wealth in the great war, and is best suited, economically and otherwise, to form the nucleus of a new government."

We have so far looked at the matter, the complete reunion of Poland, from a purely Polish point of view—the desire of the Poles for unity. We may conclude by looking at the matter under a larger aspect. Is it in the interest of Europe?

In order to answer this question we must first consider what precisely the inclusion or noninclusion of these territories in the future Poland means in regard to the real independence of the country. If these territories were restored to Poland and disannexed from Prussia, Poland would be strong. She would have a real political and economic independence. With coal from her coal fields in Silesia, she could build up her own industries. With her seaport Dantzig, her trade with England and other countries, which was great in the past, would no longer be throttled by Germany. If, on the other hand, these territories should be left in Prussian hands and Prussia be allowed to keep her share of the partition, if the wrong done by Frederick the Great be left unrighted, Poland, shorn of one-third of her territory, without coal for her industries or access to the sea and surrounded by German military outposts, would be weak. Her independence would be a sham. Nominally independent, at least in regard to two-thirds of her territory, under some Hapsburg prince, she would in reality be a mere dependency of Berlin.

Our choice then lies between a strong Poland, strong and self-sufficing by the inclusion of her Prussian territories, and a weak Poland, weak by the incompletion of her unity. Which is in the interest of Europe, a weak Poland or a strong? The question may be put in other terms. A strong Poland means an independent Poland, able to make an independent line in foreign policy. A weak Poland means a German Poland, wholly subordinate to Germany and German influence, a mere extension of the German Empire. Which is in the interest of Europe, a German Poland or an independent Poland?

It should be carefully noted that there is no dispute between the belligerent powers as to the necessity of reconstituting Poland. All alike have promised the restoration of Poland. The whole controversy turns upon the nature of that restoration and in particular upon the question of the Prussian Provinces, whether, in other words, the new Poland should be strong or weak, independent or German. This is the real issue. Now, it is manifestly in the interest of Europe and Great Britain that Poland should be strong and independent.

We touch here upon the old question of the balance of power. If the Polish territories of Prussia are left in Prussian hands, and if as a consequence the new Poland, nominally independent, is in reality a dependency of Germany, the power of Germany will be enormously increased. Poland, instead of acting as a barrier against German "Drang nach Osten," would form simply a bridge for new expansion to Russia and the Balkans. She would be simply part of the German Mittel Europa system, which means the domination by Germany of the whole of central and eastern Europe from Berlin to Constantinople and to the Suez Canal.

* * * * * * *

Consider what an independent and completely reunited Poland would mean to Europe.

In the first place, the power of Prussia would be broken, and, with the breaking of Prussia, Germany would cease to be an imperialist, aggressive power. Prussia rose to power upon the ruins of Poland. The destruction of Prussian militarism and the restoration of Poland are synonymous terms.

Secondly, the Baltic would cease to be a German lake. Poland on the sea at Dantzig would spell the freedom of the Baltic, and the Scandinavian States—Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Finland—would recover a real political and economic independence.

Lastly, the whole question of Mittel Europa would be changed. Too much stress is sometimes laid on Mittel Europa in its negative aspect. Too little attention paid to the question on its positive, constructive side. But it is not enough to say that Mittel Europa must be combated. We must put forward an alternative, a new and better plan, more conductive to the liberties of Europe and the interests of the entente. The corner stone of such a plan is a united and independent Poland with access to the sea at Dantzig. In close alliance with a free and independent Bohemia, including all the Czechs and Slovaks, the using the same port, Dantzig; with a greatly increased Serbia, uniting all Jugoslavs under her ægis; with Italy, her unity completed, and her security attained upon the Adriatic; with a new and greatly extended Roumania, including within her territory all the Roumanians at present separated from her; and with a free Greece, free from German domination—such a belt of States would form an unbreakable barrier against German aggression; and instead of a bureaucratic despotism under German control, called Mittel Europa, central and eastern Europe, from the Baltic to the Black Sea and from the Black Sea to the Adriatic, would become the home of free peoples. These names alone ring true, and are a sufficient answer in themselves, with all their manifold, rich historic meaning, to the bare geographical despotic term of Mittel Europa.

Even the Magyars and the Bulgarians, deprived of German support, might no longer consent to throw in their lot with Berlin.

Such is the difference in its consequences between an independent and a German Poland. An independent Poland, completely reunited, with her Prussian territories restored, means the end of Prussian militarism and the breaking of the aggressive force of Germany. It means the freedom of the Baltic. And instead of a German Mittel Europa, Poland would form the corner stone of a free Europe.

Poland, or Prussia, freedom or Mittel Europa, Europe must choose; and surely no Englishman will do otherwise to-day than pursue the old policy of Canning.

But if the division of power in every sphere is indispensable to the cause of human liberty, if the concentration of power in a single hand, call it Mittel Europa or by any other name, is fatal to the interests of both Europe and the British Empire, if the unity and independence of Poland, with access to the sea at Dantzig is essential to the equilibrium and liberty of Europe, there is yet another reason why the inclusion of these 4,000,000 Poles in Prussian Poland is an interest of Europe. The supreme need of Europe after this war is for a stable and lasting peace. Now, if the rights and aspirations of these 4,000,000 Poles are thwarted, one of the roots of a new war will be left in Europe. If the injustice of the congress of Vienna is repeated, from which Europe is suffering to-day, a new war, in no long time, will burst forth again. Let us remove such a danger now by a complete and not a partial settlement. We can not afford to tinker with these questions. The complete reunion and independence of Poland with access to the sea at Dantzig, while it would form the corner stone of national liberty throughout central and eastern Europe, would also be the surest guaranty of a just and lasting peace.

We talk much to-day of a league of nations. But it is necessary to distinguish. A league of nations may be either a good thing or an evil. Peace can not be imposed by force; it must be based upon justice. A peace based upon force alone, at the expense of justice, is simply the consecration of iniquity and revolts the human conscience. Europe does not want a repetition of the Congress of Vienna, which stifled nationality in Europe, and does not need to be reminded that the holy alliance was founded to impose by force and to perpetuate the iniquitous decisions of that congress.

A league of nations, devoted like the holy alliance of 1815 to imposing injustice on the world by force, calling it peace, would be a moral abomination. The holy alliance of the past was in the main an alliance between three powers to keep down Poland, to perpetuate the iniquity of the partitions. We do not want a new holy alliance, call it a league of nations or by any other name, if founded, like the last, upon the dismemberment of Poand.

Peace must be based upon justice. It may or may not be true that perpetual peace is but a dream, that war can never be wholly eliminated from this planet. If that be so, it is all the more necessary for statesmen and nations to extirpate, so far as in them lies, the roots of war, to seek for a just settlement which shall not deride the rights and aspirations of the nations.

Injustice has ever been the fruitful source of human misery; nor can any human being estimate the amount of misery caused to Europe by the crime of Frederick the Great. Upon the destruction of Poland, Prussia rose, and we may date this war from her partition.

If that crime be now undone, and if a new league of nations be formed, based not like the old holy alliance upon the partition but upon the union of Poland, such a league would be blessed by all mankind, and afford—for the Polish is perhaps the most central of all European questions—the surest guaranty of future peace.

STANISLAS KOZICKI.

Mr. Speaker, by recognizing United Poland, the Jugo-Slav, and Czecho-Slav as independent States or nations, we will not only be helping their cause but the cause of the allies and the cause of world democracy. To them it will be an encouragement to still greater efforts and activities and to a closer cooperation. Not only in their suffering countries but also in this country will the millions of peoples of these nationalities show their appreciation for the aid and assistance accorded to their brothers across the sea, to their mother country, and their cause and struggle for independence. I feel the recognition of the Jugo-Slav and United Poland will also bring a closer and more harmonious cooperation between the Czecho-Slovak, Polish, and Jugo-Slovak peoples, who, after succeeding in establishing full cooperation, are bound to bring about the complete elimination of Austria-Hungary in a short time. It is for that reason that I plead for the recognition of these nations and at the same time appeal to the people of those nationalities residing in our country to do all in their power to aid and assist in bringing about that cooperation across the sea, as well as in our own country, so that there will be a perfect union of these nations that they may fight harmoniously side by side for the cause which is so near and dear to them and for which our own country has offered the lives of thousands upon thousands of its bravest citizens. Of course, I fully appreciate the sacrifices and services they have already rendered our country and am proud of their accomplishments, and have the utmost confidence that they will continue to demonstrate and prove to this country and to the world that they merit and are deserving of our confidence, our aid and assistance, and recognition of their independence.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. In view of the very indefinite conception of our own people as to who the Czechs are, I wish the gentleman would, for the sake of the record, indicate the high rate of literacy and the low rate of illiteracy and the standard of the University of Prague, which I think is one of the greatest in the world.

Mr. SABATH. The University of Prague is one of the oldest in Europe, and I am proud to say that, notwithstanding the efforts made on the part of the Austrian Government to eliminate the Czech language, over 99 per cent of the Czechs are literate and less than 1 per cent are illiterate. Most of the education of these people has been secured through private Bohemian organizations which for years, in opposition to the Austrian Government, have maintained separate and private schools in every hamlet in Bohemia.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, would the gentleman hesitate to say whether our country is using any propaganda to get the people in Austria to know the feeling in America as to our desire for them to have their liberty?

Mr. SABATH. Not as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs but as a Member of the House, and one who has been closely affiliated and who has watched the Czecho-Slovak, Jugo-Slav, and Polish movements, I will state that each and every one of these organizations, in conjunction with our Bureau of Public Information, is endeavoring to acquaint the people of Austria with what is transpiring and the efforts we are making in their behalf. As you know, I have advocated the Slavic cause, believing that it will not only be to their interest but to the allied cause, feeling that the stronger the Czecho-Slovak, Jugo-Slovak, and Polish Armies become the weaker Austria will become. That I was not mistaken in my contention is now admitted by all, even those who at first doubted my assertions.

It was for the purpose of encouraging this movement that I introduced various resolutions, endeavoring thereby to bring home to these peoples the truth that, though at war with Austria, we were not at war with them, but on the contrary were their friends and fighting for their deliverance and independence, to encourage them in their efforts and in their fight for freedom. My aim was to bring home to them that we did not look upon them as our enemies, but as our friends. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman care to state whether in his judgment there is any progress in Austria toward what we want to see accomplished?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; not only in Austria, but in Hungary as well, the people are waiting for the chance and opportunity which I hope will shortly present itself. I hope the moment they have been waiting for is at hand and that soon the word will be given which will forever eliminate the Hapsburgs and end the oppressions inflicted upon them by the Hapsburg and Hohenzollern tyrants. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Are not the conditions over there such that we may expect when our armies march to Vienna that we will meet a friendly favoring army to cooperate with us in taking that ancient capital?

Mr. SABATH. I can assure you, sir, that you will not be disappointed. I hope by that time the German as well as the Austrian Armies will be defeated and eliminated, and that our Army will meet with the victorious allied forces, in conjunction with the Czecho-Slovak, Jugo-Slav, and Polish Armies, to enter that old Austrian capital. [Applause.] We can and have a right to expect that and if the recognition is given to the Jugo-Slav and Poland, I am convinced that the progress of our Army will be quickened and it will have the satisfaction of meeting within a short time the Czecho-Slovak, Jugo-Slav, and Polish Armies and take possession of that ancient capital, Vienna, witness the overthrow and elimination of the Hapsburg dynasty, and then, together, continue their glorious march to Berlin and unfurl in both of these capitals the flags that represent justice, equality, freedom, and liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, is the amendment of the gentleman pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It may be regarded as pending if he so desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer this amendment during general debate and have it considered as a pending amendment at the conclusion of general debate.

Mr. MEEKER. Would the gentleman from Alabama prefer that the gentleman from Massachusetts offer his amendment now?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I have a few amendments to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURNETT. That the amendment be offered within that time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to be voted upon at the conclusion of general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:
